The Invasions of Armenia in the 11-14th Centuries

by Robert Bedrosian

This is an indexed extract of several sections from R. Bedrosian's Ph.D. dissertation, The Turco-Mongol Invasions and the Lords of Armenia in the 13-14th Centuries (Columbia University, 1979), describing the military and political aspects of the Turco-Mongol invasions of Armenia, beginning with the Saljuqs in the 11th century and ending with Timur's invasions in the late 14th and early 15th centuries. The full dissertation may be downloaded from Internet Archive (archive.org).

Introductory:

Abstract

Chapter Two:

Armenia and the Turco-Mongol Invasions

Chapter Three (Armenia's Lords and Their Reactions to the Turco-Mongol Invasions and Domination of the 13-14th Centuries):

Triumph of the Turkmens

Conclusions

Appendices:

A. Supplementary Notes on the 11-13th Century Navarars

B. Aspects of Centrifugalism within and among Certain 13-14th Century Navarards

C. Notes on the Relations between the Mongols and the Armenian Church in the 13th Century

Bibliography and Glossary:

Sources

Literature

Glossary

Maps:

The maps included here are for the convenience of readers, and were not part of the original dissertation.

English: Caucasia in the 12th-15th Centuries, Cyril Toumanoff, cartographer.

Armenian: Zak'arid Armenia at the Beginning of the 13th Century, Suren T. Eremyan, cartographer.

Russian:

Armenia on the Eve of the Mongol Conquest (Western Lands)

Armenia on the Eve of the Mongol Conquest (Eastern Lands), Suren T. Eremyan, cartographer.
INFORMATION TO USERS

This was produced from a copy of a document sent to us for microfilming. While the most advanced technological means to photograph and reproduce this document have been used, the quality is heavily dependent upon the quality of the material submitted.

The following explanation of techniques is provided to help you understand markings or notations which may appear on this reproduction.

1. The sign or “target” for pages apparently lacking from the document photographed is “Missing Page(s)”. If it was possible to obtain the missing page(s) or section, they are spliced into the film along with adjacent pages. This may have necessitated cutting through an image and duplicating adjacent pages to assure you of complete continuity.

2. When an image on the film is obliterated with a round black mark it is an indication that the film inspector noticed either blurred copy because of movement during exposure, or duplicate copy. Unless we meant to delete copyrighted materials that should not have been filmed, you will find a good image of the page in the adjacent frame.

3. When a map, drawing or chart, etc., is part of the material being photographed the photographer has followed a definite method in “sectioning” the material. It is customary to begin filming at the upper left hand corner of a large sheet and to continue from left to right in equal sections with small overlaps. If necessary, sectioning is continued again—beginning below the first row and continuing on until complete.

4. For any illustrations that cannot be reproduced satisfactorily by xerography, photographic prints can be purchased at additional cost and tipped into your xerographic copy. Requests can be made to our Dissertations Customer Services Department.

5. Some pages in any document may have indistinct print. In all cases we have filmed the best available copy.
THE TURCO-MONGOL INVASIONS AND THE LORDS
OF ARABIA IN THE 13-14TH CENTURIES

Robert Gregory Bedrosian

Submitted in partial fulfillment of the requirements for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy in the Faculty of Philosophy
COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY
1979
ABSTRACT

THE TURCO-MONGOL INVASIONS AND THE LORDS OF ARMENIA IN THE 13-14TH CENTURIES

ROBERT GREGORY BEDROSIAN

The 13-14th centuries was a period of great turbulence in the history of the Armenian people. Over roughly 170 years (from ca. 1220 to ca. 1403) Armenia was subjected to no less than 15 invasions of Turco-Mongol peoples. The Armenian societies conquered and controlled by the various nomadic invaders from Central Asia had already experienced conquest and domination by nomadic and sedentarizing Turkic peoples two centuries earlier. The experience of invasion by nomads from Central Asia consequently, was not new to the Armenian historical experience. But there were differences among the invading groups, and differences within any one invading group.

Just as there were differences among and even within the different invading groups, so the sedentary Armenian societies which came to be dominated were of different sorts. Subject to different political entities, the various districts of "Armenia" in the 13-14th centuries were (and had been, historically) subjected to different ethnic, economic, and cultural stimuli. The Armenian or part-Armenian populations of these states subscribed to a variety of religions ranging from Apostolic, Orthodox, and Roman Catholic Christianity, to Islam. Even northeastern Armenian society (for which the historical record is the most complete) on the eve of the Turco-Mongol invasions was far from being a homogeneous ethnic, cultural or religious entity. Even where Armenians were in political control of Armenian-inhabited territories, a geographically-derived centrifugalism made the lords (naxarars) of the various districts disinclined to unite. In the 13-14th centuries, therefore, Armenia experienced the effects of a double centrifugation: of Turco-Mongol societies in dissolution, and of native Armenian naxarar society, which was itself characterized by centrifugation.

This study has two principal aims. A review of the salient political and military events associated with the Turco-Mongol invasions of Armenia is one aim. Who were the invaders, and in what ways were they alike and dissimilar? The second aim of the study is an examination of the impact(s) of the invasions and domination(s) of the 13-14th centuries on Armenia's lordly naxarar rulers. While many aspects of both areas of investigation (i.e., regarding the invasions and dominations and their impacts) have already been examined by scholars, to the present no single study has focussed on the invasions of Armenia as phenomena. Similarly, while diverse aspects of Armenia's socio-economic and political history in the 13-14th centuries have been examined by others, no single study of the lordly heads of that society has as yet been undertaken. The present work, therefore, attempts to fill a void existing in Armenian scholarship. It is hoped that this study will likewise serve as an introduction to 13-14th century Armenian history for Western scholars, to whom Armenia in this period has remained terra incognita.
CONTENTS

Introduction. 1

I. The Sources. 10

II. Armenia and the Turco-Mongol Invasions. 63

III. Armenia's Lords and Their Reactions to the Turco-Mongol Invasions and Domination of the 13-14th Centuries. 156

Appendix A. Supplementary Notes on the 11-13th Century Naxarars. 249

Appendix B. Aspects of Centrifugalism within and among Certain 13-14th Century Naxarardoms. 266

Appendix C. Notes on the Relations between the Mongols and the Armenian Church in the 13th Century. 281

Bibliography. 293

Glossary. 311
CHAPTER TWO
ARMENIA AND THE TURCO-MONGOL INVASIONS

In the early 1220's when Mongol troops first passed through the Caucasus, the Armenian population, living there and in many other localities across Asia Minor, dwelled under considerably diverse circumstances. The many states in which the Armenians were settled in the late 12th and early 13th centuries had arisen as the result of the Saljuq Turkish invasions of the mid 11th century, and for our purposes may be viewed as differing from each other principally on the basis of the amount of political and cultural autonomy enjoyed by their Armenian inhabitants. The nature of the Saljuq invasions/migrations and certain aspects of the consequences of Turkish domination merit a brief examination prior to reviewing the Turco-Mongol invasions/migrations of the 13-14th centuries because, in a certain sense, the invasions of the 11th century were a "dress rehearsal" for several subsequent invasions of Armenia from the Orient. A characterization of the Saljuq invasions and domination will provide not only an introduction to the complexities of medieval Armenian society, but also will throw into sharper relief fundamental similarities and dissimilarities with the Khwarazmian, Mongol, and Timurid invasions and administrations. This chapter first examines briefly some of the more salient features of political history associated with the pre-Mongol period: (1) the Saljuq invasions of the Armenians highlands; (2) the Turkish domination and its consequences; and (3) the new situation created by the resurgence of Georgia; the second part of the chapter details the invasions of the 13-14th centuries.

The Turkish invasions and eventual political domination of most parts of the Armenian highlands did not occur at any one date, nor were they accomplished by any one group. Rather, both as the contemporaries noted, and as modern scholars have pointed out, from the early 11th century onward various parts of Asia Minor were subjected to direct attack and to infiltration which accompanied the invasions and settlement of diverse Turkic groups there. Turkish migrations to Asia Minor continued from the 11th through the 15th centuries, a period of approximately 400 years.¹

¹ Standard reference works on the Saljuq invasions include Claude Cahen's Pre-Ottoman Turkey (London, 1968) [Hereafter PT] plus numerous articles by the same author (bibliography PT pp. 441-50); The Cambridge History of Iran, vol. 5 (The Saljuq and Mongol Periods) J.A. Boyle, ed. (Cambridge, 1968) [SHP]. Speros Vryonis' The Decline of Medieval Hellenism in Asia Minor and the Process of Islamization from the Eleventh through the Fifteenth Century (Los Angeles, 1971) [DHE] details the impact of the Oriental invasions on the Greek population of Asia Minor. On Armenia in particular see vol. III of the History of the Armenian People [Hay Ծոցուրդի պատմություն] (Erevan, 1976) [HAP], chapter 26 pp. 440-60 by S.V. Bohnazyan, "Hayastani nvaçum Sel'juq-t'urk eri kołmcö [The Conquest of Armenia by the Seljuq Turks]."
The earliest references to Turkish attacks date from ca. 1016 at which time the district of Vaspurakan in southeastern Armenia was raided—not by Turkish armies—but by Turkic mercenaries serving the Muslim emirs of Āzarbāijān. Around 1021 the area from Naxijewan to Dwin was raided by Turkmen Oghuz (Ghuzz) nomads serving in the Persian Dailamite armies. From 1029 onward,

---

1 See K.N. Yuzbašyan, "Deilemity v povestvovanii Aristakēsa Lastivertši [The Dailamites in Aristakes Lastivertc I's Narration]", Palestinskii Sbornik [PS] #7(70) 1962 pp. 146--51; S.G. Agadzanov and K.N. Yuzbašyan, "K istorii tiurskikh nabegov na Armeniyu v XIV [Toward the History of the Turkish Raids on Armenia in the 11th Century]", PS #12 (1965) pp. 144-57. The administrative inclusion into one territorial unit of parts of Caucasian and central Armenia with the Caucasian areas of Iberia, Atrpatakan and Albania dates from the 6th century A.D. when this unit constituted one of four military-administrative districts in the Sassanian Persian empire. After the Arab conquest of Iran and Armenia, Caucasian Armenia and formerly Byzantine Armenia to its west remained in approximately the same association styled by the Arabs "Armeniya" despite the fact that neither Iberia to the north ("Armeniya II") nor Albania to the east ("Armeniya I") was ethnically Armenian. Thus "Armenia" was but a part of what Arabic authors styled "Armeniya". The two terms should not be confused. During the more than 200 years of Arab domination (ca. 650-886), Atrpatakan to the east frequently was united with Armenia, and its occasionally dependable Muslim lords sometimes were given limited control over parts of Caucasian Armenia. As Aram Ter-Zewondyan of Erevan has noted, the attempts of Atrpatakan's Muslim emirs to subjugate Armenia found reflection in the works of 10th century Arab geographers—such as al-Īṣṭakhrī, Ibn Ḥawkal, and al-Mukadasi—who regarded Armenia, Arran and Atrpatakan as one province (see A. Ter-Zewondyan, "K'ust-i Kapkoh var'čakan miavorn verapruknere Xalifayut yan żamanak [Survivals of the Administrative Unit of Kust-i Kapkoh in the Time of the Caliphate]", Telekagir #9(1258) pp. 73-77. The role played by Atrpatakan/Āzarbāijān bordering Caucasian Armenia on the east in the pre-Mongol period is of interest since the region's already great importance was in time enhanced further. Atrpatakan/Āzarbāijān which had Islamized early, became a base of sorts for the Caliphate for controlling various Turkmen groups commenced raiding diverse parts of Armenia, from the direction of Āzarbāijān to the east as well as from northern Mesopotamia. In 1042 some Caucasian Armenia, Aḇān, and Iberia. Subsequently, be it from the Kurdish Muslim Shaddadids who established control over the Aḇān city of Ganjak/Ganja in the mid-10th century or from another branch of the same family which gained control of the city of Dwin in the mid-11th century, Armenia was under constant Muslim pressure from the east. Even before the emergence of the Saljuq Turks as a force in the area, exactly what was "Armenian" and what was "Āzarbāijāni" territory was not always clear. Armenia's eastern border was in a constant state of flux. The expansion or contraction of lands held there by Armenian or Āzarbāijāni Muslim lords was conditioned primarily by the ambition and martial prowess of a given lord or lords.

1

R. Husseinov[Husseynov], "La conquete de l'Azerbaidjan par les Seldjoucides", Badi Karthliaa[BK] 48-49 vol. XIX-XX (1965) pp. 99-108; HAP, pp. 442-43. During the more than 200 years of Arab domination, the geographical and demographic conception of Armenia was subject to alteration in historical southern Armenia also. Southwestern Armenia especially became an area of heavy settlement by Arab tribes. Coterminaly the Armenian element in the southwestern districts (the old Armenian districts of Aḵnjik' and Hanjit especially) thinned. Indeed, during this period the Armenian place names themselves were replaced by Arabic ones there. Unlike the previous conquerors of Armenian lands, the Arabs left colonies and emirates behind them, which, as Dr. Ter-Gewondyan stated, "opened the first serious crack in Greater Armenia... The Arab emirates drove in the wedge which gradually widened to provide room not only for the Kurds, but also for the Saljuqs, the presence of whose emirates in Greater Armenia became one of the main causes for the Armenian state's failure to survive in the 12th and 13th centuries" (Aram Ter-Gewondyan, The Arab Emirates in Bagratid Armenia, N. Garsolian, trans. (Lisbon, 1976) p. 150). Prior to the appearance of the Saljuq Turks in the 11th century, a number of emirates had existed in southern and southwestern Armenia. Among them were the Kaysite emirate, including the cities of Manazkert, Xlat’ and Xnus; and the emirate of Aḵnjik' or Arzn, embracing the cities of Nayyafarliqin, Arzn and Bales/Bitlis. Southern Armenia then, fairly early had become an area of foreign settlement. This tendency was to accelerate with time.
15,000 Turkmens from the Urmiah area attacked and looted Vaşpurakan and defeated Byzantine forces near the city of Arçes on the northeastern shore of Lake Van, while yet another group was raiding around Bjni in the northern district of Ayrarat (1042/43). From 1045-63, detachments of Turks more or less controlled by Saljuqid sultans and their generals penetrated deeper into Armenia, destroying numerous cities and devastating entire districts: Ani (attacked, 1045), Vaşarşawan in the western district of Basen (1047), the Mananaţi district of western Armenia (1048), Arcn in the northwest (1048/49), Bayburt (1054), Melitene in the southwest, Colonea in the northwest (1057), Sebastia/ Sıvás (sacked, 1059), Ani (captured, 1064), Kars (1065?), Caesarea (1067) and Manazkert (1071), to mention only the better known sites. While it appears that most of historical Armenia had been subjected to sack by 1070, it must be stressed that in several remote mountain areas, small Armenian principalities continued their existence throughout the 11th and 12th centuries, although encircled by inimical forces and under perpetual attack. These areas comprised districts in northern and northeastern Armenia (Gugark', Siwnik', Arc'ax), plus southern and southwestern Armenia (parts of Vaspurakan and Mokk', and Sasun)\(^1\). Consequently, it would be incorrect to speak of "the Turkish conquest" as being fully consummated in the 11th century. Some parts of Armenia never succumbed.

---

---

1 Armenian political control over much of the Armenian highlands had been reestablished during the dissolution of a powerful Arab empire beginning in the late 9th century. The Bagratid state, the most powerful of the several Armenian kingdoms which arose in the 9-10th centuries, apparently remembered well not only the legendary glory of Armenia's ancient Arsacid kingdom, but also the more recent extensive unit of Armeniya\(^1\), which had been named for Armenia, its most important part. Very much as the Muslim emirs of Atrpatakan/Azarbaijan attempted to control parts of eastern Armenia, basing their somewhat dubious claims on their occasional duties as tax collectors in the period of Arab supremacy, or on the more respectable claims of legitimacy through intermarriage with local naxarar houses, so the Bagratids attempted—with considerable success—to gain control of the non-Armenian parts of Arab Armeniya (see Ter-Łewondyan, "Kust..." pp. 76-77). Already by the early 9th century, a branch of the Bagratid family had established itself on the Iberian throne. During the peak of Bagratid power, under king Gagik I (990-1020), that family controlled in addition to Iberia, an extensive state stretching from Basen district in the west, to near Partaw/Barda'a in Caucasian Albania in the east, south to Manaskert and north to Šamk'or city. In addition, that kingdom had a number of vassals such as the principedoms of Xašen, Kogovit, Bagrevand, Gardman and the emirate of Golt'n, while other areas such as the kingdoms of Vanand and Taşir-Joraget, the Kaysite emirate and the principality of Taron were ruled by Bagratid family members and relations
Just as the Turkish conquests of Armenia must be discussed with regard to a particular part of the country at a particular time, so too the groups participating should be distinguished from each other. The eminent Turcologist Claude Cahen has demonstrated that from the very outset, two elements participated in the invasions, conquests and settlement of Asia Minor. Though perhaps ethnically the same people, these two groups are distinguishable on the basis of their subordination (or lack of it) to the Saljuq authorities. One group, which might be called the Saljuq "regular army" consisted of elements more or less obedient to the sultans and their generals. The other group, the Turkmen nomads, appears in the sources as an almost ungovernable force, interested solely in booty.

by marriage. Remaining areas of the Armenian highlands such as Vaspurakan in the south and Siwak' in the east were also under Armenian rule, although their relations with the Bagratids and with each other frequently were strained and hostile. Consequently, during the 10th century, despite the fact that Armenian political power was reestablished in the heart of the Armenian highlands, and that areas with sizeable and growing non-Armenian population (such as Aşnik'/Diyarbakr) became subject to some type of Armenian suzerainty, it would be incorrect to speak of "the Armenian state" in the 10th century. There were several Armenias at the time.

Indeed, quite often the Turkmens disobeyed commands to resist plundering and, what is important from the standpoint of the establishment of any centralized Turkish state in the pre-Mongol period, Saljuq sultans were frequently obliged to send armies against the Turkmens—fighting Turkmen rebels almost as often, it would seem, as the autochthonous populations\textsuperscript{1}. Furthermore, the nomadic pastoralist Turkmens were the bane not only of the Saljuq authorities, and, of course, of the sedentary Armenians, but also of the Muslim states which bordered Armenia on the east (the Shaddādids of Ganjak in Caucasian Albania) and south (the Warwānids), in the period of the invasions. Each successive invasion—Saljuq, Khwārazmian, Mongol and Timūrid—pushed before it, brought along with it, or dragged in its wake into Asia Minor thousands of these virtually uncontrollable nomadic warriors who (when totally unchecked) devastated the cities searching for plunder, destroyed the countryside and the complex irrigation systems turning cultivated fields into pasturage for their sheep herds, and reduced the possibilities for internal and international trade by infesting the trade routes between cities, and attacking caravans\textsuperscript{2}. Despite C. Cahen's \textsuperscript{1} PT p. 27, pp. 32-50.

\textsuperscript{2} DMH pp. 258-85.
differentiation it remains true, nonetheless, that whether a detachment of Turkmens pillaged a given locale under orders from the sultan, or in defiance of those orders, the results ordinarily were the same. Certainly such fine points of distinction were lost on the victims themselves who were killed or raped and led away into slavery. Even if the obviously inflated figures of contemporary eye-witnesses are halved, even if quartered, the extent of the damage occasioned by the Saljuqs during the period of the conquest was and is dizzying.¹

Turning now to some of the consequences of the Saljuq invasions and domination vis-à-vis the Armenians, a number of tendencies are observable. For the most part the Saljuqs acted as catalysts on phenomena which predated their arrival. One striking example of this is the demographic change observable in central Asia Minor (Cappadocia), northern Mesopotamia and Syria. In the early 11th century, the Byzantine government had followed a policy of removing powerful Armenian lords (naxarars) and their dependents from their native Armenian habitats and settling them to the west and southwest. Thus Cappadocia and Armenia Minor (P'ok'r Hayk'), areas which centuries earlier had hosted sizeable Armenian populations suddenly became re-Armenized on the eve of the Turkish invasions. The invasions quickened the tempo of Armenian emigration and extended its range in a southwesterly direction (into Cilicia) and

¹ DIH pp. 155-65. Also pp. 166-67, which contain a listing of towns, villages and provinces destroyed, pillaged, enslaved, massacred or beseiged.

1 V.T'emuryan, "Hayeri artagait'a depi gamirk' 11rd darum [The Emigration of Armenians to Cappadocia in the 11th Century]", Telekakir #2(1955) pp. 75-83; V.K.Iskanyan, "Ararunyac artagait'amasin [On the Arcrunid Emigration]" Patma-banasirakan Handes[PBH] #3(1965) pp. 67-82. Without a doubt, prior to the Saljuq invasions of the 11th century, it was Christian Byzantium in the west which posed the greatest threat to the various Armenian kingdoms and princeloms. Indeed, it is clear not only to modern scholars, but the very contemporaries themselves recognized the fact that Byzantium's ill-conceived policies vis-à-vis the Armenian kingdoms were responsible in large measure for the success of foreign conquest and penetration of Asia Minor. Already in the mid-10th century, Byzantium had seized the southwestern Armenian district of Taron. To it were added other western Armenian districts such as Der'jan, Mananal, Mašteank' and Pašnaturm. Although frequently governed by Bagratids appointed by Byzantium, the prefecture of Taron including the above-mentioned districts experienced Byzantine administration for over 100 years before the Saljuq conquests. Coterminal with Byzantine military pressure on parts of western and northern Armenia, the Empire attempted to induce various powerful Armenian lords to will their hereditary lands to itself in exchange for new lands elsewhere. Thus did the last king of Vaspurakan, Senek'ērim Arcruni leave southern Armenia to settle in Byzantine Sebastia (1021) which was given to him "in perpetuity". Supposedly tens of thousands of Armenians from Vaspurakan accompanied Senek'ērim. By a similar route, the Empire acquired the Ani-Şirak kingdom in 1040. The last ruler of that state also received lands in Byzantine Cappadocia, and also quit Greater Armenia with thousands of his followers. The consequences of Byzantine pressure from the west were twofold. First, numerous parts of Greater Armenia were stripped of their natural military defenders, thereby facilitating Saljuq penetration. Second, various areas of Cappadocia, North Syria, Cilicia and Georgia became Armenized or re-Armenized with tens of thousands of emigrants from Greater Armenia. The pace of emigration quickened with the Saljuq invasions. See succeeding two notes. Also R.W.Thomson, "The Influence of northward (into Georgia). The nazare, relocating as

1 The complex history of Cilicia lies beyond the purview of this study. In the absence of any thorough modern study of that kingdom, one might consult G.G.Mikaelian, istorial Kilikiiskoko Armianskogo gosudarstva[History of the Cilician Armenian Government] (Erevan, 1952), or S.B.Botnanyan, Soc’al-tntesakan haracterut’yunna kilikyan haykakan petut yunum[Socio-economic Relations in the Cilician Armenian State] (Erevan, 1973). On Monol-Cilician relations see Galstyan’s Armenian article in PEH #1(1964) and the English translation of it in the Armenian Review, vol. XIX No.1-113 (1976), "The First Armeo-Mongol Negotiations", pp.26-37. Political and demographic conditions on the northern border served to confuse what was "Armenian" in that area also. As Cyril Toumanoff has demonstrated [in his Studies in Christian Caucasian History (Georgetown, 1963), part V: "The Armeo-Georgian Marchlands", pp. 437--99], between Armenia and Iberia from northeast to northwest stretched a series of border districts which were neither Armenian nor Georgian, but Armeo-Georgian, as their double names attest. Possessed of mixed Armenian and Georgian populations, such border districts over the centuries passed from Armenian to Georgian political control (or vice versa). Among these districts were: Tayk'/Tao, Kol/Koł, Artani/Artahan, Javak'ti/Jawank', T'rialet'i/T'feik', A'soc'/Aboc'i, Tašir/Taširi, Gogarene, Kolbap'or, Jorap'or and Gardman.

A very strong Armenian presence existed in Iberia at least from the Arab period on, when many Armenian families settled there. Among these were offshoots of the Amatunis, Arcrunis, Bagratids, Kamsarakans, and Mamikoneans. C. Toumanoff estimates that about 1/5th of the Georgian royal (Bagratid) and princely dynasties were of Armenian origin [ C.Toumanoff, "Caucasia and Byzantium", Traditio 27(1971) p.129 n.73]. The tendency for Armenian migration northward to Iberia accelerated with time. Concomitantly the creation of great Armeo-Georgian dynasties reflected the growing Armenian influence in Iberia.

In the immediately pre-Saljuq period, the greatest threat to Armenia in the north came not from Iberia, but from the political manoeuvrings of Byzantium. In the year 1000, upon the death of the Georgian Bagratid ruler of Tayk'/Tao, David the Curopalate, David's hereditary state of Upper Tao as well as his Armenian territories--Karin, the districts of Basen and Apahunik' with the city of Manazkert as its capital--passed to the Empire by "will". In 1021 the Byzantine emperor Basil II invaded the north and annexed the they did with sometimes sizeable forces, occasionally were powers to be reckoned with. Several such powerful and ambitious naxarars carved out for themselves principalities over an extensive area stretching from Cilicia on the Mediterranean, southward to Antioch, eastward to Edessa, northward to Samosata, to Melitene/Malatya, and elsewhere. However, it must be stressed that despite what appears to have been large-scale emigration from Greater Armenia, those departing (principally families of means) nonetheless constituted a minority of the total indigenous population of eastern Asia Minor which remained in situ.

districts of Tayk'/Tao, Kola/Kol, Artani/Artahan and Javazet'i/Jawark'. Between 1041 and 1043, Byzantium attacked the city of Ani three times, but was repelled each time. In 1045, through treachery, the Ani-Sirak kingdom was annexed. The same year the Pahlawunid prince-dom of Bjni in northeastern Armenia succumbed. Its territories had included the districts of Nig, parts of Varažnunik', Kotayk' plus Kayean and Kaycon fortresses. In addition to Toumanoff's Studies one should consult his important articles in Tractio, especially "Caucasia and Byzantium", and in The Cambridge Medieval History, vol IV, The Byzantine Empire, part I (Cambridge, 1956) ch. XIV "Armenia and Georgia" pp. 619-24 for background. See also Appendix A of this study.

and overwhelmingly Armenian in the period covered by this study.

1 PT. p. 154. In C. Cahen's opinion, the number of Turkmen invaders/migrants throughout the 11-12th centuries remained small: "Several tens of thousands, certainly; but that they numbered several hundreds of thousands is doubtful..." (PT p. 33). "It is difficult to believe that movements of peoples at that period can have involved more than a few tens of thousands of individuals in any one operation, at the most two or three hundred thousands, even though the texts give the impression of enormous masses (it should be remembered that regular armies in battle contained at the most a few thousand men)" (PT p. 143). See also DMH p. 261 n. 718 where Vryonis has compiled figures from the sources concerning the invasions.

In the 11-12th centuries Turkish settlement in Armenia seems to have been very limited. Cahen notes that Azarbaijan to the east became and remained the ethnic base for the Turks of Asia Minor in this period (PT p. 79). Furthermore, in the early 12th century when Turkish immigration in Iran itself had become stabilized, "the Turks established in Asia Minor no longer permitted any others to come among them and divide their spoils" (PT p. 90). Turkmen "settlements" (or perhaps, "concentrations" would be more apt, since the Turkmen were nomads) were established when and if [the Turkmen tribe] could secure a winter base after its summer raids. Until it could acquire and defend a winter base in Anatolia, the tribe usually left Asia Minor at the end of the summer raiding season. Once located, the tribes usually established a semianual transhumant pattern between their summer yayla in the mountains and their winter base in the plains (DMH p. 279). For a list of possible Turkmen settlements—temporary and "permanent"—cited by 11-15th century sources see DMH p. 281 n. 791.

The medieval Armenian translation of the Kö, known as "Juanšer", mentions Turkmen concentrations and their yaylas in northern and northwestern Armenia. Speaking of the success of Georgian king David II the Builder (1089-1125) in expelling these elements, the text reads: "In that period some 10,000 Turks raided in Trežk [Trialeti]. David was at Načarmad. When he heard about them he came at night with but few troops, and in the morning, with God's aid, beat them until evening. The few survivors fled at night. Similarly, in the Tayk' country there were tens of thousands of Turkish troops which had descended into the Tayk' country. [David] went and struck them, and took their goods, and the country of Georgia filled up with good things.... But while the great David was celebrating the feast of Easter at Nackedran, they brought him news that Another tendency of medieval Armenian life receiving a stimulus (or perhaps, reaffirmation) from the Saljuq domination was centrifugation, a key feature of Armenia's socio-geopolitical system, naxararism. The Saljuqs were even less successful than their Armenian predecessors (Arsacidae, Bagratidae) in holding together in one state the different parts of eastern Asia Minor. As was mentioned above, centrifugal tendencies were inherent in the very nature of the Turkish migrations/invasions. Furthermore, the ruling family of the Saljuqs—just as their Armenian predecessors—was obliged to grant appanages to junior the Turks had slain Bēškēn in Jawaxēt' and had come and encamped on the shores of the Arax. He went against them, destroying and capturing their entire army... He struck at the Turks in [their] wintering grounds of T'iuārk' and filled up with booty. On the 13th of February and on the same septenary of fasting, he took Kapa city and filled up Georgia with gold and silver. On May 5th he raided Layižk' as far as K'urdawan and Xātalan and returned to K'art'li in wealth. The same year he went to Ašorni and beat the army of Turks until there were not left [even] mourners in their tents.... Now the Turkmen ascended the mountains of Armenia in summertime and in wintertime descended to the warm meadows by the banks of the Kur river—but not without great preparation due to fear of David. However, that year they were without a care because of the king's distance. The king returned, skirting Mt. Lixt before him, and came to K'art'li. He found prepared troops in the month of March and went to Xunan and did not allow [any] of the multitude of Turks to live. He crossed to Partaw and discovered in the villages, fugitives from the Turks. He put them to the sword and returned in peace" (Juanšer, p.118-20).

1

See the introduction and also ch. 3 below.
members and these "fiefdoms" quickly transformed themselves from conditional to hereditary landholds. Indeed, prior to the establishment of Saljuq control over much of the Armenian highlands by the late 11th century, the proliferation of small and usually mutually inimical Muslim emirates had begun. In the east, embracing parts of eastern Armenia, Caucasian Albania, and Āzarbāijān was the emirate of Ganjak (ruled independently from 1148 to 1225). In the south, in the areas of Aţnjik'/Diyārbakr and Xlat', the holdings of the Muslim Marwānid emirs quickly were confiscated by the Artukids of Aţnjik' (1101-1231), and the Saljuqid Shāh Armens of Xlat' (1100-1207). In the west, the Turkmen Dānishmandids (1097-1165) ruled a large area including Sebastia/Sīvās, Caesarea, and Melitene/Zalatya. Finally, in the northwest, were the emirates of Karin/Erzerum (ruled by the Saltukids ca. 1080-late 12th century) and Kars (ca. 1080-1200). From 1118 Erzinjan and Divrigi belonged to Mangüjek, founder of yet another dynasty\textsuperscript{1}. The ruling dynasties of these states were sometimes joined together by marriage ties, or sometimes united to fight a common enemy (usually Georgia to the north). But more often they were at war with each other. Meanwhile, throughout the 12th century the Saljuqid Sultanate of Rûm, centered at Iconium/Konya in the west, was constantly attempting to control one or another of the above-mentioned states. As economic conditions stabilized by the end of the 12th century, Konya was indeed well on the way to achieving its aim\textsuperscript{2}.

1 PT pp. 234-48.

5 PT pp. 96-107; HAP pp. 469-70, 579-80.

\begin{flushright}
\textsuperscript{1} S.V. Borzouyan, "Salduxyannere Karinum [The Saltukids in Karin]", HAP pp. 490-91; \textit{PT} 106-8, 115, 118; HAP p. 492, \textit{PT} p. 127; \textit{PT} pp. 108-12, 236-37, 242-44.

\textsuperscript{2} \textit{PT} passim, H. Massé, "Le sultan seldjoukide Keykobad Ier et l'Arménie", REA IX(1929) pp. 113-29.
\end{flushright}
The political, social and economic fragmentation of Armenian states which accompanied the Turkish invasions and a similar fragmentation of Turkish states resulting in the proliferation of emirates was new neither to the Armenian nor to the Turkish polity. Also not unexpectedly for naxaran Armenia, the political fragmentation was accompanied by religious fragmentation. Not only were numerous small Armenian political entities engendered, but several kat'okikoi (or anti-kat'okikoi) emerged in the 11-12th centuries. In this case, too, the confusion created by the Saljuqs acted as a catalyst on a phenomenon of hoary antiquity, which long predated their arrival.1

The situation created by the overlordship of ostensibly Muslim rulers over Christian Armenians across most of the Armenian highlands was not new.2 Inasmuch as religious and political agreement in the ancient world were often inseparable, and because Armenia's powerful neighbors were determined to control that state, the Armenians were no strangers to religious persecution.3 Immediately prior

2 On the nature of Turkish "Islam" see DMH pp. 270-73; PT p.8.

3 Throughout most of Armenia's history, the pressure to alter the country's apostolic Monophysitism had come from
to the arrival of the Saljuqs the Armenian people had been subjected to a bloody campaign of religious persecution from Orthodox Byzantium. For this reason, and because of the violently anti-Byzantine reaction such a policy engendered, all segments of the Armenian population did not respond in a uniform way either to the Saljuq invasions, or to the domination. Indeed, some few Armenians saw the anti-Byzantine Turks not as the agents of God sent to punish Armenians for their sins, but as an excellent vehicle opportunely available to themselves for vengeance against the Greeks. The contemporary non-Armenian sources in particular accuse the Armenians of siding with the Turks, deserting from the Byzantine armies sent to "defend" Armenia, and even joining the enemy.

three directions: (1) in the west, from Orthodox Chalcedonian Byzantium; (2) in the east from Iran and Atrpatakan/Azarbaijan (first Zoroastrian, later Muslim); and (3) in the south from Muslim Syria and the Arab emirates established in southern Armenia. Over the centuries, many Armenians living in areas bordering the three regions, or settled within these states themselves had, for reasons of expediency or conviction "apostasized". See Toumanoff's "Armenia and Georgia", passim.

1 Bart'ikyan, op.cit., DMH pp. 92-93.

2 DMH pp. 93-110.
The establishment of Turkish political overlordship over an overwhelmingly Armenian Monophysite Christian population in eastern Asia Minor, and over Graeco-Armenian populations in central Asia Minor did not immediately lead to widespread conversions to Islam. This was to occur in the 12th and early 13th centuries, and to resume after a hiatus, in the early 14th century. But during the time of the Saljuq invasions, Armenian Islamization seems to have been limited, restricted mostly to those obliged to convert to save their lives, and to the tens of thousands of Armenian women and children forcibly removed from their homes and sold on the Middle Eastern slave marts entering Muslim harems and households. In this early period too, several influential Armenian naxarar women were sought after as brides by Saljuq rulers.

1 On Saljuqid slave-trading in Asia Minor see DMH pp. 174-79, and also my article, "The Slave Trade in Armenians in the 11-14th Centuries" in a forthcoming issue of the quarterly Ararat during 1980.

2 The daughter of Kiwrike, king of the semi-autonomous northeastern Armenian state of Tašir-Joraget is one example. With great reluctance her father surrendered her to sultan Alp Arslan (in 1064/65)[Paltmat'ıw Maxwesewy (The History of Matthew of Edessa) (Jerusalem, 1869) pp. 174-75 [Hereafter ME]. See also Juanšer, p. 113; Another example may be Gohar Khatun (d. 1118/19), wife of sultan Malik Shah's son, Isma'ıl (ME, p. 427). It is clear from the testimony of Abu'l Fida that already by the mid-11th century, Armenian women (most probably Muslim Armenians, or Islamized slave-women) were being taken as brides by the now Turkicizing Caliphs of Baghdad, supreme chiefs of orthodox Muslims: l. Kat'ır an-Nada (d. 1057/58), mother of Caliph al-Kayim (Nalbandyan trans. of Abu'l Fida, Arabakan atbyuner, Erevan, 1965) p. 215 and n.20; 2. Arjivan, mother of Caliph Moktadi bi-Amr Allah Abu'l Kasim (d. 1094/95) p. 217 and n.26; 3. the mother of Caliph Presumably many of them Islamized. Subsequently, after the establishment of Saljuq political control, other Armenians converted, be they the young Armenian boys, gulams, absorbed into the Saljuq military schools, or the skilled Armenian bureaucrats and artisans who dominated numerous important positions within the various Turkish states, and who figure prominently in Turkish epic literature (see below)\(^1\).

The upshot of this conversion, forcible or voluntary, was the creation with time of a distinct group—virtually excluded from the Armenian sources as "renegades", but apparently not yet fully accepted by their new Muslim co-religionists either, who in their sources usually style

---

Mostadi bi-Amr Allah Abu Muhammad al-Hasan ibn Yusuf ibn Mostakid (d. 1180), p. 222 and n. 50. The fact that succession in the Caliphate tended to pass hereditarily from father to son meant that throughout the 11-12th centuries, many of the Caliphs were of some Armenian descent. However, it must be underlined that Armenian extraction did not necessarily mean that the individual identified with the Armenians, or even that he or she was aware of the relation.

them "Armenians". However, it must be underlined that the majority of the Armenians remained true to their own

---

Most notably Abu'l Fida, who specifically notes the Armenian descent of certain Caliphs as well as of prominent functionaries in Muslim governments. The Armenian literary historians are loathe to mention the reality (and of course the extent) of conversion. However, that intermarriage with Muslims was indeed becoming a problem is clear from certain articles in the so-called Penetential of Dawit of Ganjak, C.J.F. Dowsett, ed. (Louvain, 1961) Corpus Scriptorum Christianorum Orientalium, vol. 216, Scriptores Armeniaci, tomus 3. This work, which deals primarily with the degrees of penance necessary for various offenses was written at the beginning of the 12th century in or near Ganjak. Dr. Dowsett writes: "As the many passages in the Xratk' kanonakank' [Penitential] dealing with the relations between Christians and infidels (usually specified as Kurds) show, Dawit' lived his life in a time of troubles for his church and nation. The Christians were subject not only to the contamination of their food, vessels and holy places by Muslims, and the misfortune of seeing Armenian women become their wives, mistresses or nurses: the church might clearly at any time be threatened by what Dawit' calls "hopeless tyrants" (ch. 37), and attacks on Christians were not unknown (chp. 59)." The relevant entries are:

(16) Concerning an Armenian woman who lives with a Kurd [and will not separate from him] for the sake of Christianity, p. 16; (17) Concerning a woman who dwells with a Kurd, p. 17; (18) Concerning a woman who fornicates with a Kurd, p. 17; (19) Concerning those who voluntarily give their daughters to infidels, p. 17; (20) Concerning those who feed the children of infidels at the breasts, p. 18. That many of the same problems had continued through the 12th century is clear from the inclusion of identical or similar entries in the Law Book of Mikt'ar Gos (d. 1213).

Religious conversion in this period was not unidirectional. There was also Turkish conversion to Christianity, both forced and voluntary. Juanšer, speaking of the deeds of David II the Builder (1089-1125) notes David's attempt to Christianize the shamanist Qipchaq Turks of the north Caucasus: "Now [David] kept with him on Georgian soil 40,000 Qipchaqs with their families and sons plus 500 young children whom he raised at his court as Christians, and others still day by day were baptized and studied the faith of our Lord. He armed the 40,000 and designated spasalars for them and repelled Persia and T'urk'astan with them". Juanšer, p. 119. Similarly, voluntary conversion of Turks to Monophysitic Christianity was not unknown. The Armenian Church has canonized the Turkish martyr Yordanan who was slain in Karin/Erzerum on Good Friday, 1182, distinctive form of Christianity. This fact, coupled with the reality of an Armenian majority in eastern Asia Minor, in its turn led to yet another phenomenon—also not new on the highlands, albeit this time affecting the overlords, not their subjects, i.e., what might be termed the Armeni-ization of the Seljuqs. Not only did Armenians of different faiths—Apostolic, Orthodox, Muslim—constitute the bulk of the population in eastern Asia Minor during the Seljuq domination, but fairly quickly an Armenian-Turkish community came into existence through intermarriage.
Intermarriage occurred not only between the families of Armenian civil servants and Turkish lords, but at the very pinnacle of the state. By the 13th century, few were

1 Armenization which resulted from intermarriage with Armenian noble families and from the vacuumization of foreigners occurred in some of the Arab emirates of southern Armenia and among some of the Kurdish Shaddadids in the 10th-12th centuries. See Ter-Hewondyan, Emirates, pp. 45-50, 97-98, 119, 124; Minorsky, Studies, pp. 39, 43, 47 n.1, 51, 80-106 passim.

2 Turks also intermarried with Greeks and Georgians.
Greeks sources style the offspring of such unions mixovarvaroi. "Though this phenomenon of intermarriage and the appearance of a new generation of mixovarvaroi is only briefly mentioned by the sources, one must assume that it was no rare or isolated occurrence. These mixovarvaroi suffered occasionally from a dichotomy of political sympathy and allegiance, but in the long run their appearance in Anatolia resulted in a process that favored the growth of the Muslim population at the expense of the Christian population, because Muslim society dominated politically and militarily. It is interesting, but unprofitable, to speculate about what would have happened to the Anatolian mixovarvaroi under different political circumstances" (DEH, p. 176). Vryonis continues elsewhere: "There is every reason to suppose the Saljuq sultans and rulers of eastern Asia Minor lacking an Armenian, Georgian or Greek parent or grandparent. Indeed, some have suggested that the great warlord and founder of the Dānishmandid emirate, hero of the Turkish epic the Danishmend-name, emir Malik Dānishmand himself, was an Armenian Muslim. Judging from the many clearly that intermarriage took place rather extensively from the very beginning of the Turkish occupation of Anatolia and for several centuries thereafter. Anna Commena speaks of the offspring of such unions as mixovarvaroi, and the twelfth-century Balsamon refers to their curious practices. When the Greek historian Nicephorus Gregoras passed through Bithynia en route to Nicaea in the middle of the fourteenth-century, just one generation after the conquest of Nicaea, he observed that the population consisted of Greeks, mixovarvaroi (Graeco-Turks), and Turks. Thus intermarriage of Muslims and Christians at every level of society played a very important role in the integration and absorption of the Turkish Christian element into Muslim society (DMH pp. 228-29). The Turkish-language equivalent of mixovarvaroi may have been ikdiah, signifying a gelding or cross-bred animal, particularly a mule. See PT pp. 192-93.

1 DMH pp. 227-34. Furthermore, certain Christian families of western and central Asia Minor, cited as "Greeks" in Greek sources, such as the Tornikes, Taronites, Phocades, Musela, Sklero, etc. were in fact of Armenian descent, even if no longer identifying as such. See A.P.Kazhdan, "Armiano-vizantiiskie zametki", PEH #4(1971) pp. 93-105, and the same author's recent study, Armiane v sostave gospodstvuushchego klassa Vizantii v XI-XII v. (Armenians in the Composition of the Ruling Class of Byzantium in the XI-XII Centuries) (Moscow, 197); P. Charanis, The Armenians in the Byzantine Empire (Lisbon, 1963).

2 According to S.Eremyan, "Liparit zoravari hajordnera ev Dannišmanyaw tohto cagan xndira [The Successors of General Liparit and the Problem of the Origin of the Danishmandid Line]", Tekelagir #8(1947) pp. 65-79, Malik Danishmand was none other than the Armeno-Georgian Hrahut/Rat Orbelean/Liparitean. The Turkish scholar Haliç Yinanc, Selçuklu Darviri, [cited by I. Melikoff in La Geste de Melik Danismend (Paris, 1960) p. 76] probably following the 18th century Armenian historian M. Çamçejan has suggested that Danishmand was an Armenian captive of war—possibly Saljuq architecture not only took some of its inspiration from Armenian ecclesiastical and civil structures which graced and still grace the landscape of eastern Asia Minor, but in the 11-13th centuries, many of the structures themselves were designed and constructed by Christian and Muslim Armenians. By the end of the 12th century Armenia was well on the way to absorbing and transforming its newest residents.

The emergence of Georgia as a great military power in the late 11-12th centuries radically shifted the balance scales in favor of complete Caucasian cultural as well as political supremacy in eastern Asia Minor. Thanks to Georgia, much of historical Armenia once again came under Armenian political control—though briefly—and those parts that were not, were either tributary to Georgia or had made peace with that state. Beginning in the reign of the Georgian Bagratid monarch David II, called "the Builder" (1089-1125), the armies of Georgia commenced clearing southern and southeastern Georgia of nomadic Turkmen, capturing from them Samşoyldé and many strongholds in the Armeno-Georgian district of Somxit'i (1110); Lofé

---

1 DMH p. 236 n. 563. One might also compare the style of dome characteristic of Armenian churches—the ışmbet'—to the Saljuq kumpets and turbēs. Compare e.g., plates 15,16,17 in S. Der Nersessian's The Armenians (New York, 1970) to FT p. 394 pl. 24, p. 399 pl. 30, p. 402 pl. 34, p. 403 pl. 35.
Saljuq architecture not only took some of its inspiration from Armenian ecclesiastical and civil structures which graced and still grace the landscape of eastern Asia Minor, but in the 11-13th centuries, many of the structures themselves were designed and constructed by Christian and Muslim Armenians. By the end of the 12th century Armenia was well on the way to absorbing and transforming its newest residents.

The emergence of Georgia as a great military power in the late 11-12th centuries radically shifted the balance scales in favor of complete Caucasian cultural as well as political supremacy in eastern Asia Minor. Thanks to Georgia, much of historical Armenia once again came under Armenian political control—though briefly—and those parts that were not, were either tributary to Georgia or had made peace with that state. Beginning in the reign of the Georgian Bagratid monarch David II, called "the Builder" (1089-1125), the armies of Georgia commenced clearing southern and southeastern Georgia of nomadic Turkmen, capturing from them Samşoyldê and many strongholds in the Armeno-Georgian district of Somxit'i (1110); Lofê

---

1 DMH p. 236 n. 563. One might also compare the style of dome characteristic of Armenian churches—the qmbe—to the Saljuq kumpets and turbêş. Compare e.g., plates 15, 16, 17 in S. Der Nersessian's The Armenians (New York, 1970) to FT p. 394 pl. 24, p. 399 pl. 30, p. 402 pl. 34, p. 403 pl. 35.
Agarak and the Kiwriean holdings (1118)\(^1\); Samaxi, eastern Gugark', western Utik', Gag, K'awazin, Kayeun, Kaycon, Törunakan, Nor Berd, Tawuš, Mahkanaberd, Manasgom, and Xalinosk'ar (1123)\(^2\). The same year, Ani was taken, though that city passed back and forth between the Georgian and the Muslim emirs many times throughout the 12th century\(^3\). During the reign of David's successor Demetre I (1125-1155/56) and his successor Georgi III (1155/56-1184) the conquests continued though at a slower pace. Throughout this period, the Georgian army was swelling with Armenian volunteers, enthusiastically participating in the liberation of their country. Furthermore, the Georgian Bagratids, themselves of Armenian descent, very definitely favored certain Armenian nobles long since established within Iberia and within that country's ruling structure\(^4\). Such lords as the Zak'arean/Mxargcelis, Orbelean/Orbelis and Arcruni/

---

1 Juanšer pp. 118-19; KG pp. 162-63.

2 Juanšer p. 121; HAP pp. 525-26.

4 MEd p. 447; Juanšer p. 122; VT p. 28; W.E.D. Allen, A History of the Georgian People (New York, 1971, repr. of 1932 ed.) pp. 85-108 passim. A certain amount of conflict resulted from confessional differences between Georgians and Armenians, which secular leaders were unable to resolve. See Appendices A and B.
Mankaberdelis not only commanded the victorious armies, but were left in charge of the newly established administrations\(^1\). The Georgian Bagratida reached the apogee of their power under queen Tamar (1184-1213). Under Tamar's generals, the energetic brothers Zak'arē and Iwanē Zak'arean, the Armeno-Georgian armies surged ahead reclaiming one after another fortress, city and district: Anberd in Aragacotn district (1196), Samk'or, Ganjak, Arc'ax, Siwnik', Sirak, the Ayrarat plain and Ani (ca. 1199); B'ni (1201); and Dwin (1203)\(^2\). They now turned upon the southern and western emirates, defeating the renowned sultan of Konya, Rukn al-Din in the district of Basen (1204)\(^3\). In 1204/5 they reached as far south

---

1 While, strictly speaking, it is more precise to refer to the lords as naxarar/didebulə[in light of their Armeno-Georgian backgrounds and affiliations] and to provide the double Armenian and Georgian forms of their surnames, since this study examines aspects of the Armenian background only, we shall hereafter prefer the Armenian forms except in cases where the source warrants another usage. HAP, pp. 527-28, 530-31;

3 "Alişan, Hayapatum, colophon #313, p. 448; A.Abrabamyan, "Ruk n-ed-Dini partut yune [The Defeat of Rukn al-Din]", Terəkəğir, #5-6 (1941) pp. 78-83; HAP p. 536.
as Manazkert and Arzeh on the northern shore of Lake Van, although this area was not taken until ca. 1208/9. Iwané's daughter T'amt'a was married to the Shāh Armen of Xlat in 1209/10. In a great final burst, general Zak'arē marched through Naxijewan and Julia, through Arzabājiān to Mārand, Tabrīz and Qazvīn, looting and sacking Muslim settlements. By the time of Zak'arē's death in 1212, Georgia was the most powerful state in the region, while the status of the Armenians, be they inhabitants of historical Armenia—northeastern, southern, western—of Georgia, or of the plethora of small communities stretching to the southwest to the independent Cilician kingdom had been changed in a very positive way. This situation was to be altered again almost at once.

---

1 Ibn al-Athīr, year 601 (1204-5) pp. 509-11; year 605 (1208-9) pp. 517-22. In any case, it does not seem that this area was under direct Georgian military control for very long, HAP p. 537.

2 KG p. 164; VA p. 138; Ibn al-Athīr (p. 510) followed by Bar Hebræus (p. 361) incorrectly reports that "Zakare the Less" died during the siege of Xlat'. Abū'l Fida (Nalb. trans., p. 228) without naming Zak'arē, styles him the "king of Georgia". During the Xlat' campaign, Iwane was captured. The marriage of T'amt'a was part of the peace terms proposed by the Shah Armen. Eventually T'amt'a became ruler of the Shah Armen state in her own right, ruling from ca. 1212-31 (T'urēyan, op.cit., pp. 126-31).

3 KG pp. 184-86; VA chp. 83 pp. 139-40; HAP p. 538; S. Arzaman, Amiraspasalar Zak'aria Erkaynabazuk [Amiraspasalar Zak'aria Mxargrceli] (Erevan, 1944) pp. 58-60. On the nazarars in this period see chapter three below and also Appendix A.
The great demographic, military, and political changes which had taken place in the history of the Armenians in the late 12-early 13th centuries have left their imprints on the contemporary sources. In the 11-14th century sources there is justifiable confusion over the borders of Armenia. Political boundaries, of course, do not always embrace neatly definable regions of ethnic, linguistic, and cultural entities, and "Armenia" in the 13-14th centuries was a fine example of this. Because of large scale emigration, resulting in the creation of new diasporas, one could draw very wide indeed the cultural boundaries of Armenia, in this period, even though a delineation of the political boundaries is well-nigh impossible.

As was pointed out above, by the 1220's, Armenians were dwelling over a sizable territory embracing the Armenian highlands, Georgia and Cilicia. Some, though hardly all, of these areas were under Armenian political control, a circumstance which created confusion among the contemporaries. Mxit'ar Gosi (d.1213) for whom as for other Armenian clerics the political boundaries were less important than the demographic, used a new term to designate part of Armenian-inhabited southern Armenia, alternately controlled by the Ayyubids and the Shah Armeni:"meso-Armenia" (mijn-shayk', Arakk' Mxit'aray Gosi (The Fables of Mxit'ar Gosi) (Venice, 1854) p. 160). With the Mongol invasions and domination of most of Asia Minor, political boundaries became less distinct. For the 13-14th centuries, characterized by the almost perpetual invasions, we are unable to do more than cite the testimony of confusing and/or confused sources. To the Arab geographer Yaqt (d.1229) the uncertain boundaries of Armenia reflect the confusion occasioned by Georgia's resurgence and expansion into previously Armenian-controlled and/or populated areas, as well as the reality of Armenian majorities in areas not under Caucasian political control. Moreover, in Yaqt's day, the 7th century Arab geographical designation "Armeniyya" still was being used, although the author notes that its constituent parts were debated:"It is said that there are a Greater and Lesser Armenia. On one side reaching from Bardi'a to Bab al-Abwab and on the other as far as the country of Rum and the Caucasus mountains and the country of lord Sarir, Some say that Greater Armenia is composed of Akhlat/Ilat' and its environs; while Lesser Armenia of Tiflis and its environs. There are also those who say that there are three, even four Armenias. The first consists of Baylakan, Kabalan and Shirvan and the regions subject to them; the second: Jurzan, Suddabil, Bab Pirus-Kuban and al-Lak'z; the third: Basfurjan, Dabil, Siraj, T'ayr, Bakravand and Annaşavan; in the fourth is the grave of one of the Prophet's comrades, Safvan ibn al-Muatt'al...also Simšat', Kalikala [Erzerum], Sisakan, Davil, Naşava, Siraj, T'ayr, Bakravand, Ilat', and Bajanayis, formerly were under the Greeks' domination, but the Rumi's united them to the Şirvan prince-dom" (Yaγut, Naib. trans. pp. 16–17). Among the cities and districts of Armenia a Yaγut listed as having Armenian Christian populations are: Ardes (p.12), Erzijnan (p. 14), Erzerum (p.15), Aflughunia (near Nisibis, p. 21), Bayburt (p.28), Balu (p.30), Bitlis (p. 33), Čapaşjur (p.46), Ilat' (p.60), Dvin (p. 62), Zavaşan/Anjevaš 'ik' (p. 76), Samosata (p. 79), As-Suwaïda (near Harran, p. 81), Taron (p. 92), Kažvan (p. 96), Kabala (near Darband, p. 99), Kars (p. 99), Mokk' (p. 110), Muş (p. 111), Mapazkert (p. 111). Yet the same author speaks of Azarbaijan as extending "west as far as Erzijnan" (p.10).

To William of Rubruck, Sebastia/Sivas was located "in Lesser Armenia" (WR p.276) and Erzerum "belongs to the Sultan of Turke (WR p. 266), but the same author continues: "You must know of the Turke that not one man out of ten among them is a Saracen; nearly all are Armenians and Greeks" (WR p. 280). Speaking about the population of Marsengen (between Kars and Erzerum) he noted: "All the people in the burg were Christians--Armenians, Georgians, and Greeks. The Saracens had only the lordship" (WR p. 273). Interestingly, William describes his host Sahnsah of Ani, not as an Armenian, but as "a Georgian prince" (WR. p. 271). The celebrated Venetian Marco Polo travelled across the Armenian highlands in the year 1294/95, and his account pertains to the mid to late 1290's: "Let me begin with Armenia. The truth is that there are actually two Armenias, a Greater and a Lesser [Cilicia]". On the same page, while describing the northeastern borders of Lesser Armenia or Cilicia, Marco Polo wrote: "Lesser Armenia is bounded on the south by the Promised Land...on the north-east and east by eastern Turkey, with the towns of Kaişarieh and Sivas and many others, all subjects to the Tartars" (MP p. 46 ). Marco Polo mentions the Armenian populations of Konya, Kayseri/Caesarea, and Sivas. He notes the Armenian city of Erzijnan, seat of an archbishop, and the other large cities of Greater Armenia, Erzerum and Ardes (MP p. 47). In describing the population of the city Tiflis, he mentions the Armenians before the Georgians (MP p. 50), and observes the presence of Armenians in Tabriz (MP, p. 57).

The late 13th century Geography, attributed to Vardan Arsevelc'i, apparently in part under the influence of the 7th century Anania of Sirak, and in part in reflection of the demographic spread of Armenians in the late 13th century, draws the borders of Armenia very wide indeed: including all of historical Armenia plus Edessa and Aleppo (Geog., p.21) Cilicia (p. 24), Azarbaijan (pp. 15-16) and much of Georgia (pp. 17-18). Vardan concludes his Geography with the crucial expression: "these are the lands and districts of Armenia/of the Armenians (ašxarhun ew gamawr' n Hayoc"). Indeed, though he does provide the Arabic or Turkish forms of some Armenian place names, he nowhere mentions that in his day most of historical western Armenia no longer was under Armenian political control (see Vardan's usages Arzrum for Karin (p. 18), Tiarrak'ir for Aţnık' (p. 21), Malat'ia for Melitene (p. 21), Sewaat for Sebastia (p. 23)].

Het'um the Historian, writing in the early 14th century, extends Armenia from the Darial pass in the Caucasus to "Media", and includes (as does Vardan) the city of Tabriz, then an area of Armenian population (Het'um, p. 14). In describing the "Kingdom of the Turks" [Rum], Het'um wrote: "In the Turkish kingdom dwell four peoples: the Greeks, Armenians, Jacobites ...and the Turks" (p. 21).

Ibn Battuta, who visited Asia Minor in the early 1330's wrote of Erzğun (then almost 300 years under non-Armenian rule): "a large and populous city, most of whose inhabitants are Armenians" (Ibn Battuta, p. 437). To Qazvini in the 1340's, Armenia was divided into two sections. Greater Armenia was the Lake Van basin with its capital at Xlat', though it extended "from Arzan-ar-Rum[Erzerum] to Salmag, and from Arran to the further end of the Akhlat[Xlat'] district" (Qazvini, p. 100). The "chief dependencies" of Lesser Armenia were Sis, Cyprus and Trebizond (?), Qarin and Tarun (p. 100, 258). Schiltberger (who visited the Armenian highlands in 1402-1405) calls Erznjan the capital of Lesser Armenia (Schiltberger, p. 21) which also embraced Bayburt and Kamax (p. 43). Elsewhere he wrote: "In Armenia are three kingdoms, one is called Tiflis, the other is called Sis, the third is called Erzingen...and that is Lesser Armenia (p. 86). Clavijo noted large concentrations of Armenians in the Tabriz area (Clavijo p. 150, 309). He described Khoy as a city of Upper Armenia with a majority of Armenians (p. 148). He noted populous Armenian villages south of Khoy (p. 330) and stayed in Armenian villages during his transit of central Asia Minor and the Caucasus (pp. 111-148). Contradictions within and among the sources, resulting from the frequent changes in the area's political and military history, preclude a more specific definition of Armenia in the 13-14th centuries.
In the early 1220's, Armenia was subjected to a number of Turco-Mongol invasions. These invasions, all related to one another (though hardly coordinated) were made from different geographical directions. Varying in scope, participants, and intent, all of them nonetheless contributed to the destruction of the military capabilities of the Armeno-Georgian armies. Taken individually, the consequences of each invasion might have been overcome. But the invasions were, in a sense, a chain reaction. One followed the next within the space of a few years. This quick succession of attacks more than anything else explains how the mighty Armeno-Georgian forces, so recently on the aggressive offensive against hostile and far-flung powers, were so quickly humiliated, destroyed or neutralized before the onslaught of the Mongol conquerors in subsequent decades.

Chronologically, the first incursion was made in 1220/21 by a detachment of some 20,000 Mongols who had been sent across Central Asia by Chingiz-Khan in pursuit of the Shâh of Khwârazm\(^1\). The latter succeeded in evading

---

1 Useful secondary sources on the Mongol invasions are SMP; B. Spuler, The Muslim World, part II, The Mongol Period (Leiden, 1960) [Hereafter, Spuler]; J.J. Saunders, The History of the Mongol Conquests (London, 1971); for Armenia in particular, FT; DMH; Alizade; SEPFA; HAP III, ch. 35, L.R. Babayan, "Mongolakan aršavank nera ev Hayastani pycume [The Mongol Invasions and the Conquest of Armenia]", pp. 597-613; HAP IV (Erevan, 1972) ch. 1, L.S. Kačikyan, "Hayastani k'elak'akan vičake ev soc'ial-tutesakan harabut - yunnere XIV-XV darerum [Armenia's Political Situation his pursuers and had, in fact, died in obscurity on an island in the Caspian Sea the same time the Mongols were entering the Caucasus. The Mongols' route into Armenia was from the southeast, from western Naxijewan north to the Aghstev region. A certain disagreement exists among the sources regarding the location(s) of the Mongols' first battle(s) with Caucasian forces. But the outcome apparently was that some 10,000 Armenians and Georgians, commanded by king Georgi IV Laşa of Georgia and his atabek Iwanē Zak'arean were defeated in the Kotman area of northeastern Armenia. Through espionage the Mongols

1 SMP. pp. 309-10.

2 HAP III p. 600; Babayan is challenged by Galstyan in CAMA, pp. 357-58; The Armenian sources report the following on early Mongol activities in the Caucasus: 1. Kir-akos Ganjakec'i: "...Thus finding many people unconcerned, they [Mongols] destroyed and ruined many places. Then they secured their bags and baggage in the marshy, muddy place which lies between the cities of Bartaw and Belukan—a very safe place which they call Belamej—and they destroyed many districts with brazen attacks", KG p. 202; 2. Vardan Arewelc'i: The initial penetration of the Caucasus is presented in chapter 84 of his History. "In 1221... foreign-looking and foreign-sounding people called Muhal and T'at'ar moved from the land of Çin and Maçin and came to Gugark's meadowlands by way of Albania. There were some 20,000 of them. They destroyed everything that they found alive and then quickly turned back. Now [king] Laşa pursued them with all his forces, reaching [the Mongols] by the Kotman river. He was defeated by them and saved himself by flight, with Iwanē. Some prince had whipped the latter's horse (gačer žilin) such that Iwane lost him. However, Vahram, lord of the land, who was uninformed of the others' flight, went [pursuing the Mongols] as far as Gardman, displaying great bravery in the face of severe destruction", VA p. 142; 3. Grigor Aknerc'i: Aknerc'i's information on the initial penetration is found in chapter 3 of his History and immediately follows his hazy reference to Jalâl al-Dîn: "Together with all of this, they once more took a command from their khan, who was called Čankez khan. And they attacked the land of the Albanians and Georgians.

"When the king of the Georgians heard about the coming of the Tat'ars he went against them with 60,000 cavalry to the great plain called Kotman, located before Terunakan fortress. When the battle was joined, through the influence of satan, the enemy of truth, Hamidawla, the lord of Manasa stable, because of some grudge, hamstrung the horse of At'abak Iwane. For at that time Laša, king of Georgia, had died leaving a son named Dawit' and a daughter Rusudan (Urûzuk'ân). Dawit' had fallen into the hands of the sultan of Rum and was in prison. His sister Rusudan held the kingdom under the supervision of Iwane, called the At'abak.

"Now as was said above, when the news of the coming of the Tat'ars was learned, Iwane took the cavalry of the Georgian kingdom and came to Gag, to the great and wise prince Varham, son of Plu Zak'are. Taking him with his own army he went against the Tat'ars. The mighty and great prince Varham took the right wing and Iwane the left. But when they attacked each other the accursed Hamidawla worked this crime which was described.

"When the Nation of the Archers saw such dissension amongst them, they grew stronger and attacked the Georgian cavalry, mercilessly killing them.

"However the great prince Varham, lord of Gag, who had taken [command] of the [army's] right wing went on until evening, mercilessly attacking and killing the Tat'ars until the plain of Sagam was generally filled with slain Tat'ars. When Varham, prince of Gag heard of the destruction of the forces of the kingdom, sorrowing greatly, he left off warring and returned to his secure fortress called K'arherj. This took place in the year 663 of the Armenian Era (=1215)", GA, pp. 292,294; 4. Step'annos Orbelean: After describing the 7 years of famine and calamities occasioned by Jalâl al-Dîn, Step'annos wrote: "Now after 11 years, the Lord raised up out of the East the Nation of the Archers or Mužâls, also vulgarly known as T'at'ars, from the land of Čin and Mačin, from beyond Xat'astan... Now the third division [of the Mongol army] passed straight through the land [of Persia], crossing the great Jahan river which they themselves call the Amu Mawra. And moving about like a storm, they reached our land, generally subjecting every place...The first to come to [this] land were Čawrmân, Çâkatay, Ašlan, Asawur and Laša khan. They took the land in 1237 (685 A.E.)", SA pp. 146-48. In other words, as far as Step'annos cares to relate, the first penetration of the Mongols was linked with the immediate submission of the Orbeleans; 5. The confused account in the History of Kart'li associates the appearance of the Mongols in Caucasus with the hunt for Jalal al-Din, but the chronology is impossible. Chingiz-Khan sent princes Yamay and Salpian with 12,000 soldiers "having no arms or food, no swords, and only bows and arrows. "They traversed T'uran, Jeon, Xorasan, Brai[Iraq], Atrpatakan, and reached Ganjak. No one opposed them, but if [resisters] appeared anywhere, they defeated all of them. Having reached the borders of Georgia they began ravaging the Gag country. Vahram[Varham] Gageli and atabek Ivane learned about this and informed king Laša about foreign tribes speaking an unknown language who had come to ruin Somxit'i. The king summoned his army, Imerc'is and Amroc'is, gathered a force of 90,000 and sent them to that border of Gag where the Tatars were. From there a large force joined them, comprising atabek Ivane and his brother's son Sahnšah [Sanše] and the məxurt'-uxuc'as Vahram of Gag, and they went on".

The Tatars were encamped on the banks of the Berdugh/Sagin river. They defeated the Georgians who fled. "The Tatars reached as far as Šamšvilde and turned back from there working such amazing deeds. They went by the Darband road [and], because neither the Širvanšah nor the people of Darband resisted them, they passed through the the Gate of Darband and entered the Qipchaqs' country. These they forced to fight, and many times the Qipchaqs battled but the Tatars were always victorious. And so they went on, fighting.

"Thus as I said, [the Mongols], unarmed and with unharnessed horses, traversing such a road crossed Qipchaq, circum-obducted the Darband Sea and reached their ruler Chingiz-Khan in Qara-Qorum. This extraordinary feat was accomplished without stopping, crossing all the roads with unharnessed horses. Those who had come from Qara-Qorum returned there. When Chingiz-Khan learned that the Tatars had been victorious everywhere, he sent his sons to find sultan Jalal al-Din of Xorasan", Kh pp. 166-67; Muradyan[Mur.], pp. 55-56.
learned of an alliance forming against themselves to include besides Armenians and Georgians, those forces still loyal to the rulers of Xlat' and Azerbäijân. Consequently, without delay the Mongols invaded Georgia in January, 1221 taking along an Azerbäijânî defector plus his troops of Turkmens and Kurds whom they obliged to fight in the vanguard—a typical Mongol battle tactic. Northern Armenia and southeastern Georgia were looted, and then the invaders returned to their base in Utik'. In spring of the same year they moved south toward Tabriz, plundering and destroying the cities of Marâqheh, Hamadân, Naqîjewan, Ardâbil, and later Utik' 's largest city, Baylakan, carrying off large herds of horses, mules, donkeys, oxen and sheep. Despite its success, this army had not been sent for conquest but to pursue the Khwârazm Shâh and to conduct reconnaissance for future operations. Thus, considering their mission accomplished, the Mongols departed via the Caucasus mountains to the north, destroying the city of Sâmîk' or enroute.

---

3 CAMA pp. 358-59; HAP III p. 602; Ibn al-Athîr pp. 453-55; According to Kirakos, the king assembled an even larger army and "wanted to battle the enemy. But the T'at'ars collected their wives, children, and all their bags and baggage, and desired to pass to their own land through the Darband Gate. Now the Tačik troops who were in Darband did not allow them to enter. So the T'at'ars crossed the Caucasus mountains at an impassable spot, filling the retrospect, this Mongol campaign, conducted by a relatively small army of 20,000 was nothing short of astounding, accomplishing the defeat of 20 peoples and a complete circuit of the Caspian in less than two years\(^1\).

The second invasion of the Caucasus took place immediately after the Mongol departure in 1222, and was caused by it. This time the participants were nomadic Qıpчаq Turks from the plains to the north. In their turn defeated by the Mongols, one sizeable body of Qıpчаqs fled from them in a southward direction. Requesting dwelling places in the Caucasus, they were disbelieved and refused at Darband, whereupon they pillaged and looted there; at the Georgian city of Kabala; and all the way south to the city of Ganjak in Caucasian Albania\(^2\).

abyss with wood and stones, their goods, horses and military equipment and thus crossed over and went to their own land. The name of their leader was Sabada Bahatur", KG p. 203. Vardan: "In 1223 those same [Mongols] wanted to depart. Furthermore, their ambassadors had found Armenia and Georgia [militarily] ready and assembled, and they so reported (тaрa-ball). [Thus] they did not dare come and instead turned and went away", VA p. 142.

\(^1\) J.J. Saunders, op.cit., p. 59.

\(^2\) HAP III p. 602; SEPHA p. 93; Ibn al-Athir pp. 463-67; Kirakos' information is found in his chapter 12: "Afterwards when some time had passed, another force of Huns, called Xbfatal came through Georgia to king Laša and to the hazaratet lwane so that these two might give them a place to dwell and [in exchange] they would serve them loyally. However they did not agree to accept the Qıpчаqs. "So the Qıpчаqs arose and went to the residents of the city of Ganjak where they were joyously received, since
The emir of Ganjak permitted the QIपchaqs to settle in the environs of the city, intending to use them against Georgian incursions. The atabek Iwanē mustered troops and went against them, but he was defeated, having underestimated their strength. What was worse, many naxarars and didebuls were captured, then killed or ransomed for huge sums of money\(^1\). The QIपchaqs continued looting and raiding the people there had been placed in great straits by the Georgian army, which ruined their lands and enslaved man and beast. The Ganjakeč gave the Huns an area to reside, located within the confines of the city and they aided them with food and drink so that with their help the citizens might resist the Georgian kingdom. The Hun army halted there and settled", KG p. 204, Varden: "...And in the same year [1223] a large army of Huns called QIपchaqs (Xwčał) came to Ganjak and united with them [i.e., with the people of Ganjak]. And because our forces went against them carelessly and in surety, they were dispersed, separated, and fled. Many were killed by the sword, while others were taken alive and put into prison —some from among the glorious azats included. Among the prisoners were the prince called Grigor son of Xalbak and his nephew (brother's son) the manly and valiant champion named Papak. They were avenged the next year when our forces wiped out a large part of the QIपchaqs when the latter came to the land of Vardanašat", VA pp. 142-43.

\(^1\) Ibn al-Athīr, pp. 468-69; Kirakos: "Then Iwanē mustered troops and arrogantly went against them. He boasted greatly that he would exterminate them and the city as well, placing his trust in the multitude of his soldiers and not in God Who gives the victory to whomever He pleases. When the two groups clashed, the barbarians calmly emerged from their lairs and put to the sword the wearied and [God-]forsaken Georgian army. They arrested many and put the remainder to flight. There was, that day a great destruction of the Christian troops. So many were abandoned by the protection of God that one poor [fighting] man was able to capture many brave and experienced warriors, like a shepherd leading his flock before him. For God had removed His aid from their swords and did not succor them in battle. The QIपchaqs brought the honorable men [of the captives] and sold them for some clothing or food. Persians bought them and tormented them with impossible tortures, demanding such quantities of gold and silver that it was impossible to pay. And many died there in jail.
different parts of the Caucasus until 1223 when Iwanê, in alliance with Azarbâijânis, Lezghians and other peoples finally defeated the Qîpchaqs, killing or selling them into slavery. The Qîpchaq raids, though less serious than the invasions which preceded and succeeded them, nonetheless contributed to the continued unsettled state of affairs initiated by the Mongols; depleted the Armeno-Georgian military of some choice leaders; and undoubtedly weakened the army's morale.

The third devastation of Armenia took place from 1225 to ca. 1230, during which time various parts of the country were subjected to raids and invasions by the ethnically diverse armies of the new Khwârazmshâh, Jalâl al-Dîn Mangûbirdî. Resembling his father, he offered stubborn and occasionally successful resistance to his Mongol pursuers. This was, however, at the expense

"The Qîpchaqs seized, among others, Grigor, son of Haîbak, brother of brave Vasak and his brother's son Papak, for Vasak had three sons...But after some days had elapsed, the great hazarapet Iwane once again mustered troops and went to wreak vengeance on those who had destroyed his soldiers. He attacked them at an unexpected hour and put the barbarians to the sword. He captured their booty and enslaved their children, taking both to his land", KG pp. 204-6.

2 PT pp. 49, 128; SEPRA pp 94-99; CAMA pp. 359-60.
3 SMP p. 330.
of other peoples, notably the Armenians and Georgians.

At the head of an army of some 60,000 Turkmens and Qipchaq mercenaries, Jalāl al-Dīn invaded northeastern Armenia following the age-old route of invasion, through Nazijewan and northward. He took and devastated Dwin, and at Garni defeated the 70,000 man strong Arménio-Georgian army commanded by Iwane. This was followed by the capture

1 HAP III p. 604; DMH p. 133 notes the general increase of nomadic elements in Asia Minor as a result of Jalāl al-Dīn's flight.

2 SMP p. 327; Kirakos' account is fairly extensive, and includes one date, 1225/26 (674 A.E.) in the heading for chp. 18 of his History: "18. Concerning Sultan Jalāladīn and the Destruction of the Georgian Army in 674 A.E." KG states that Jalalādīn, sultan of Xorasan (Khwarazm) as a result of the Mongol attack on his lands fled "through the land of Albania and he came and captured the city of Ganjak. He then assembled his countless troops from among the Persians, Tašiks and Turks and came to Armenia".
Iwane learned of Jalāl's arrival, informed the ruler of Georgia, and massed the army, boasting that if he defeated Jalāl al-Dīn he would force all the Armenians under Georgia's omination "to convert to the Georgians' religion [to Chalcedonian Orthodoxy], while they would kill those resisting". KG attributes the Caucasian defeat to this blasphemous arrogance.

Meanwhile Jalāl al-Dīn had come to Kotayk'. The Georgian army camped nearby, and observed that the Khwarazmians were unaware of this. "Now as soon as this was observed by one of the senior Georgian princes, Salue and by his brother Iwane, men brave and renowned and triumphant in battle, they said to the other troops: 'You stay in one place while we shall go and engage them. If we turn some of them in our pursuit, the victory is ours. Do you then spring out.
But if they defeat us, then do you flee and save your lives'.
"As soon as they engaged them they began to destroy the sultan's army. But the Georgian soldiers paid no attention and instead fled the place..." fleeing unpursued as far as Garni. Then the sultan's army followed, killing and throwing soldiers over cliffs.

"Sultan Jalāl al-Dīn came to the head of the valley and saw a pitiful sight. For a multitude of men and horses lay there piled up like a heap of rocks. He shook his head and said: 'This is not the work of man but of God for Whom all is possible'. He then turned to rob the corpses of the fallen, and having ruined many places, went off to the city of Tiflis(T'j Jis)", KG pp. 224-25.

Vardan Arewelc'i's information is found in chp. 85 of his History. The account differs in detail from what is found in the other Armenian sources: "Now toward the end of 1225/26, two sons of the Xorazm-Sah, defeated and harassed by the T'at'ars came in a body of 200,000 so they say, through the land of Azarbaijan (Adlparakan) to Ostan in Armenia. This they took and filled the plain with wide tents. Our forces went against [the Khwarazmians] and not a few from our side were lost, both by the town of Gafni and, a larger group, which fell over ditches into chasms. This was God's wrath upon Iwane in recompense for the new and alien evils worked by his wife. For when the presbyter Parkest died, she had his body removed from the grave and burned. Then a dog was sacrificed on the place...." Jalal al-Din meanwhile, after conquering many places returned to Tabriz. A year later he went to Tiflis by way of the plains of Gag, VA p. 143.

Step'annos Orbellean's account is briefer than Kirakos' and provides some additional detail. Step'annos notes Jalal's destructive movement from Atrpatakan to the Araratean district where he encamped. When atabek Iwane went to fight him, the account here becomes somewhat different. According to Step'annog, Salae and his brother Grigor observed how sparse the Khwarazmian army was and signalled the Caucasian troops to attack. However, God altered the response so that it sounded like "flee". The fleeing army crossed over some loose ground near Gafni which gave way, and the mass fell into the ravine. "But atabek Iwane got away with 10 men and fled into the fortress of Gese.

"As for Liparit [Orbelean], he found some byway and went home with all his men, praising the Lord [for his deliverance]. This transpired in the year 1225/26 (674A.E.). Now after this the whole land became sullied through unbelievable disasters and various [calamitous] events; for the Khwarazmians, finding the land without a master, mercilessly killed and enslaved and set on fire all the homes and dwellings in the cities, villages, and monasteries; they also burned all the crops and cut down the vineyards and trees, as a result of which a severe famine ensued everywhere". A plague followed and wolves, which had grown accustomed to human carrion now began attacking the living. "And this calamity lasted in the land for 7 years", SQ p. 146. Step'annos does not narrate the fate of Jalal al-Din, and seems unaware (or takes it for granted) that the Mongols first came to the Caucasus in pursuit of him.

Het'um the Historian relates nothing about the episode of Jalal. This is interesting since chp. 4 of his History of the Tatars is devoted to a description of Khwarazmia which recounts the country's borders, chief city, and religion. Grigor Aknero'i too does not know about Jalal, unless, with Dr. Blake, we take the following passage to be a reference to him: "Now when this strange people [the Mongols] learned that it was the will of God [for them] to rule over us on the earth, they mustered troops and went against the Persians. And they took from them a small city. Then the Persians grew strong and took back their own and some of theirs [the Mongols' land]. Thereafter they sent out a call to wherever the Nation of the Archers—their own people—dwelled. Once more they attacked Persia, conquered them and seized their city and all their goods", GA pp. 290-292.

By far the most extensive account of the exploits of Jalal al-Din is found in the KC. Leaving aside those portions not relevant to the Caucasus, we encounter Jalal and some 140,000 followers near Dwin in Armenia: "[Then] they reached the Kxargrceli country, for Dwin belonged to atabek Iwane, while Ani had been given to his brother's son Sahnshah, the mandat'urt—uxuc'es. The Khwarazmians came in the third year of Laša—Georgi's death, to enslave and wreck Dwin and the surrounding countries". Iwane and Vahram of Gag informed Rusudan about the arrival of the foreigners, and an army was sent.

There was some enmity between Iwane and the two Axalc'-xec'i brothers, Salva and Iwane. During the first encounter with Jalal, atabek Iwane injured his foot [the author attributes this to the enmity]. This encounter took place near Gafni. Thereafter Iwane refused to participate in further combats. Apparently under his control were parts of the royal army which he also forbade to fight. However, the T'orelia and the two brothers did do battle with Jalal. Salva is captured and the Georgians flee. His brother Iwane died while hiding in the mountains of Gafni. Salva was killed after a year, for not apostasizing. Atabek Iwane returned to Bjni while Jalal went to Azarbaijan and Naxi'jewan whence he raided Georgia. Two years later Iwane died and his son Awag was made amirspasalar.

"[Jalal al-Din] went and destroyed the whole country of Dwin, the k'ust of Dwin, all of Ami, Somxit'i, Gag as far as Ganja, Samk'or. To that time, Samk'or and the neighboring countries belonged to Vahram of Gag...".

Sultan Jalal al-Din learned that the atabek and spasalar Awag was at Bjni and he urged Awag to get queen Rusudan to consent to be his wife. Awag relayed the proposal to Rusudan, who refused it. The jilted sultan headed for Tiflis, destroying Somxit'i enroute (KC pp. 169-73; Mur. pp. 59-63).
of Ganjak, Lori, and Tiflis in which city a frightful massacre of Christians ensued with the active participation of resident Muslims who looked upon Jalâl as a liberator. The northern cities of Ani and Kars, and the southern cities of Xlat' and Manazkert were besieged unsuccessfully in 1226. Certain areas such as Tiflis and Dwin soon were

1 SÂM p. 328; Abu’l Fida (Nalb. trans., p. 230); Kirakos notes that Jalâl al-Din took Tiflis with the complicity of the resident Persians and killed those who refused to convert to Islam. He describes the forced circumcisions and the destruction of crosses and churches. "This occurred not only in Tiflis, but in Ganjak, Naxijewan and elsewhere" (KG p. 226). The gruesome account in Georgian, with many additional details and amplifications is found in KC pp. 175-76; Mur. pp. 64-65.

2 SÂM p. 329; HAP III p. 605; Abu’l Fida (Nalb, p. 231); BH describes Jalâl’s siege and capture of Xlat and Van in 1229 (BH pp. 394-95); see also SA p. 149; Yov. Yiâ., #388 pp. 845-46, #392 p. 857, #395 p. 862, #400 p. 871; CIA v.I p.18. The KC provides information not found elsewhere: "After so destroying Tiflis, they began laying waste, enslaving, exterminating, and destroying Somxît'i and Kambeçian, the borders of Lori, K’art’i and Trialeti, Javaexet’î, Artahan, and parts of Tao and Same’xe, the lands around Karnip’or and Ani. This chastisement and providential wrath continued for five years. For two years in the beginning [the Khwarazmians] destroyed the country, then for five years they remained in the city and destroyed the above-mentioned countries. Excepting fasts and fortresses, there were no other structures [left standing in the land]", KC pp. 178-79; Mur. pp. 66--67. Eventually Jalâl learned that the Mongols were approaching, so he left Tiflis for Arzabaijan, meanwhile urging the sultan of Xlat’ the Caliph, and the sultan of Iraq to help him resist the enemy. They declined. "...guessing that his army and that of Atrpatakan would be unable to withstand, [Jalâl al-Din] quit Atrpatakan and again went as the fugitive to Tiflis", KC p. 182; Mur. p. 70. Rusudan summoned her army, opened the Darial Gates enabling northerners (probably Qipchaq Turks) to pour into Georgia, and sent this motley group against Jalâl, who was encamped in Bolnisi valley, Somxît’î. These royal troops were put to flight by the sultan who then went on to Tiflis, destroying", KC pp. 182-83; Mur. p.70.
retaken by the Caucasians, but Jalāl al-Dīn continued devastating one or another section of Armenia until 1230 when he was decisively beaten near Erzinjan by a united force composed of troops of Malik-Ashraf of Xlāt', the Saljuq sultan of Rūm, Kai-Qubād, Cilician and Crusader detachments. Jalāl was murdered the next year by a Kurdish peasant. His raids and devastations

1 PT pp. 129-30; HAP III p. 605; Abu’l-Fida (Nalb. pp.
233-24); Ibn Bibi pp. 154-74; Yov.Yiğ., appendix, #11 pp. 1031-32; VT p. 75. KG's information is found in chp. 19 of his History, "Concerning the Destruction of Sultan Jalal al-Din and His Death". According to this source, after Jalal had defeated the ruler of Xlāt', Malik-Ashraf, he married the latter's wife T'amt'a, who was the daughter of Iwane. As Jalāl went on to ruin other districts under the sway of 'Ala al-Din, sultan of Rūm, the latter mustered a mixed army including Egyptians, Cilician Armenians and Franks. Supposedly, although there were less than a thousand Cilician Armenians and Franks, it was due to their valour that Jalāl al-Din's army was routed, KG pp. 22g-29.

"Now sultan Jalāl al-Dīn returned to the land of Al'bania to the fruitful and fertile Mughan plain, in great shame.
He encamped there and wanted to assemble an army. However, the T'at'ars who had expelled him from his own country as a fugitive pursued him and chased him as far as Amit' (Amida), where they ferociously struck his forces. The impious prince died in that very battle. But some say he went on foot thence as a fugitive, and that a man chanced upon him and recognized him as the one who had earlier slain one of his relations, and so killed him to avenge his relative's blood. Thus did the evil one die, wickedly " KG p. 230.

2 SMP p. 335; KG pp. 229-30 (see note 1 above); VA: "After committing many crimes, he turned upon Xlāt', took it, and enriched with booty went to Rūm against sultan 'Ala al-Din and Malik-Ashraf. However he suffered a great defeat in battle and fled with a few [followers] to Mughan, that plain so suited for all human and animal needs. Then the T'at'ars--who had thrown him out of his country earlier --fell upon him suddenly and thence put him to flight to Amida. Either he died inadvertently while fleeing, or he fell to the T'at'ar sword, or else, as is said, one of had lasted seven years. Not only did he bring mass destruction of human life and property, but also famine and pestilence, since, as Step‘annos Orbelean noted, Jalāl al-Dīn and his unruly troops frequently cut down fruit trees and vineyards and burned the crops¹.

[Jalāl’s] own people whose relation had been killed summarily was disgruntled on this account and also because of the uncomfortable movings about of [the army] which he had caused. And so vengeance was exacted for the blood of the innocent that had been spilled" (VA pp. 143-44).

The KC: "Hearing this [news of the capture of Ganjak by the Mongols], the sultan hurriedly arose with his family and fled to Rum. Meanwhile the Tatars were pursuing him and reached Basen. As soon as [the Khwarazmian army] saw the coming of [the Mongols], they scattered. The sultan even was left alone. He reached some insignificant village and fell asleep under the trees. By chance, someone saw him and killed him. The sultan’s belt, saddle and quiver were adorned with great gems for which that lofty and renowned ruler was slain....When the Khwarazmians dispersed, many fled to Garmian while sultan Jalal al-Din was killed.
With this, the great kingdom essentially was ended" (KC claims that the murderers were Kurdish brigands.

¹ SO p. 146; Ibn Bibi describes the problems caused by the lingering Khwarazmian troops to the settled Saljuq rulers (pp. 178-84). He mentions an invasion by the sultan of Egypt in 1232 which was aided by the malik of Zarberd (pp. 184-90). The leaderless, dispersed Khwarazmians served as mercenaries in the armies of different rulers (pp. 220-22). According to BH, some 10,000 Khwarazmians were settled by ‘Alā’al-Din, but he does not say where (BH p. 397).

BH speaks of the Mongols invading the Zarberd area of southern Armenia around 1230. These were most likely detachments returning from the pursuit of Jalal al-Din:
"Then a legion of the Tatars invaded the country of the fortress of Zaid [Zarberd] and it came on as far as the Euphrates, which is in Melitene, and it crossed the plain of Hanazit. And because the whole population through their terror had fled to the places and towns which were disaffected and the fortresses, there was not much destruction. And those Tatars went back and ruled over Adhorbijan and Shaharzur, and they subjugated the Iberians also" (BH pp. 396-97). Ibn Bibi (pp. 175-78) speaks of Mongols raiding as far as Sebastia/Sivas in 1230.
Following the deaths of king Georgi IV Laša (1223) and Iwane Zak'arean (1227), Christian Caucasia, already seriously weakened now lost the possibility of united resistance against attackers, and this at the very moment when it was needed most.

The fourth invasion of Armenia occurred in 1236. It was short and merciless, and confined to the northeastern and northern regions. In that year the Mongol general Chormaghun, now established at the Mongol summer camp in the Mūghan plain of Āzarbāijān, sent out detachments under various commanders to capture all the key fortresses in northeastern Armenia. Unlike the first appearance of the

In the period from 1230 to the reappearance of the Mongols in western Armenia, the situation there was hardly stable. BH records that the fortress-cities of Xarberd and Xlat' constantly were passing back and forth among Muslim rivals (BH pp. 400-401). In the early 1230's we see Armenians and Georgians fighting in the armies of the Saljuq sultan in Palestine (BH p. 400). The same author records a famine in western Armenia around 1234 (BH p. 401). In the late 1230's, Khwarazmian remnants still were powerful enough to give sultan Ghiyath al-Din problems, ravaging Samosate and Xarberd (BH p. 403; VT p. 77); Armenian collophons also speak of Mongol raids in western Armenia prior to 1236. See Yov. Yiğ., #403 p. 878, #405 pp. 882-83.

1 HAP III pp. 606-607; SEPHA p. 103; CAMA p. 360; Kirakos' History contains considerable information on the conquest of parts of Caucasia prior to the submission of certain princes. After noting the establishment of the Mongols in Mughan, he commences in ch. 21 with an account of the capture and destruction of Gajjak, a city then densely settled with Muslim Persians:

"Immediately the T'at'ar army arrived and besieged Ganjak on all sides, battling it with numerous war machines. They struck the orchard which surrounded the city. Then they demolished the city wall using catapults on all sides."
However, none of the enemy entered the city. They simply remained there, fully armed, for a week guarding it" (KG p. 236). Many of the residents then burned down their houses and killed themselves. "When the enemy observed this, they became furious and put everyone to the sword: man, woman, and child. And no one escaped them but for a small brigade, armed and fully prepared which broke through one part of the wall at night and fled. Some few dregs were also spared and tortured to reveal where the treasures were kept. Then they killed some of them and took the rest captive. They then dug through the charred homes and removed whatever/whomever they found there. And they were occupied with this for many days, and then departed.

"The T'at'ars then circulated through all the districts around the city to dig up and hunt for goods and wares. They discovered many things made of gold, silver, copper, and iron, as well as various garments which had been hidden in cellars and subterranean chambers.

"And so the city remained desolate for four years. They then commanded that it be rebuilt, and a few people slowly assembed there and rebuilt it, except for the wall.

Ch . 22. Concerning the Destruction of the Lands of Armenia and Georgia by the Same Army.

"A few years after the destruction of Ganjak this fanatical and wily army divided up by lot all the lands of Armenia, Georgia, and Albania, each chief according to his importance receiving cities, districts, lands and fortresses in order to take, demolish and ruin them. And each went to his allotted area with his wives, sons and army baggage, where he remained without a care, polluting and eating all the green plants with camels and livestock" (KG pp. 236-37). Kirakos then notes that Georgia was in a weakened condition as a result of the misrule of Rusudan whom he characterizes as a lascivious woman. "Rusudana exercised the authority through the commanders Iwane and his son Awag; Sahnsah, son of Zak'are; Vahram [of Gag] and others". Iwane died and his position was taken by Awag. "And since they were unable to withstand that great blizzard [of Mongols] which had come, they all betook themselves to fortresses, wherever they were able. The Mongols spread throughout the plains, mountains, and valleys like a multitude of locusts or like torrential rains pouring down on the land" (KG pp. 237-38).
Mongols in the Caucasus which had been for the pursuit of a fugitive, their reappearance now was for the purpose of conquest and occupation. On this occasion, the Mongols travelled with their families, carts, and herds—their "portable economy". Upon receiving news of the return of the Mongols, the ruler of Georgia, queen Rusudan (1223-47) with many of the naxarar/didebuls fled to the security of western Georgia, while others secured themselves in their fortresses. But no one was secure. Molar-noyin took the territories of Iwanē's nephew Vahram of Gag: Samk'or, Sagam, Tërunakan, Ergevank', Gag, Tawuš, Kacaret', K'awazin. The Kiwrikean fortresses of Macnaberd and Nor Berd fell, and about the same time the clerical historians Vanakan and Kirakos Ganjakec'i were captured. Ghatagha-noyin took Gardman, Çarek', Getabek, and Vardanaşat. Ghaghatai-noyin took the Zak'arid holdings of Lori; and soon Dmanis, Šamšulde and Tiflis fell. Iwanē's son Awag surrendered when his fortress of Kayean was beseiged by Dughata-noyin. Upper and Lower Xaşen were taken by Jughbugha, while Aslan-noyin took the Siwnik' district.

1 CAMA p. 361.

2 HAP III pp. 607-609; SEPHA pp. 104-105; 107-108; CAMA pp. 361-63; KG pp. 239-50; VA p. 145; GA pp. 294,296; KC 186-87, Mur. pp. 72-73. For translations of these passages see the notes to ch. 3.
As will be seen in the next chapter, in many cases the local Armenian princes, instead of resisting surrendered to the Mongols, were spared, reinstated in their holdings and sometimes even promoted. However, surrender did not always elicit Mongol sympathy. Fearing the harsh fate suffered by Ani, Kars surrendered but was devastated nonetheless. Surmari was attacked and ravaged. Shahin fell. Thus, during the course of 1236 the Mongols

1 HAP III p. 610; SEPHA p. 107; CAMA p. 362; Yov.Yiğ., pp. 909-911, #416 p. 917; #422 p. 936; KG: The submission of a few eastern Armenian princes did not bring a halt to the Mongols' conquering activity. Chormaghun took Awag and his troops and marched against Ani. First he sent envoys telling the people to surrender. "Those who were the principals of the city did not dare respond to Chormaghun's message without asking prince Sahnsah, since the city was under his authority. Now the mob in the city with the famiks (rabble) killed Chormaghun's delegation". Chormaghun battled with seige machinery and took the city, generally killing the population "sparing only a few women and children and some artisans whom they led into captivity. Then they entered the city, took all the goods and possessions, looted all the churches, ruined and destroyed the whole city and corrupted the glory of its comeliness"(KG p. 258).

In ch. 28 Kirakos describes the sack of Kars. Kars surrendered its keys, "but because the Tat'ars were anxious for booty and feared no one, they did there the same as they had done in Ani..."

"The same army also took the city of Surb Mari (Surmalu) which several years earlier Sahnsah and Awag had taken from the Ta'iks. And while [the inhabitants] were yet licking their wounds, suddenly a certain one of the nobles named Shah Bahatur came upon them with many troops and quickly took the city, ravishing all that he found in it" (KG p. 260).

subjugated by sword or treaty all of northeastern and northern Armenia. They met with no serious resistance anywhere.

The Mongol conquest of western and southern Armenia took place between 1242 and 1245. These lands, it will be remembered, though inhabited by Armenians were under the political domination of the Saljuqs or, in the case of Xlat', of the Ayyûbids. In 1242 Baiju-noyin (the successor of the former supreme commander Chormaghun who had lost his hearing) took Karin/Erzerum after a siege of two months. The population was massacred and led away into slavery. The Mongols spent the winter of 1243 at 1 See pp. 63-64 above.

---

2 MHP III p. 611; SEPHA p. 109; PT p. 137; Ibn Bibi describes how the rulers of Xlat' and Erzerum were arguing over money for hiring mercenaries to defend themselves (Ibn Bibi pp. 222-37); BH describes the taking of Erzerum (p. 406). During 1242 the Mongols looted as far south as Xarberd (BH pp. 406-407). KG: "As soon as Baiju assumed authority he forthwith mustered troops from all the peoples under his domination and went to that part of Armenia under the domination of the sultan of Rum". He besieged Karin and invited the city to surrender. Receiving a negative reply, Baiju broke down the walls with siege machinery and destroyed the city. "And at that time the city was very heavily populated being filled not only with Christians and Tačiks, but all the people from the whole district had assembled there [for protection]. "In the city were countless holy gospels [belonging to] the great and the small. The foreigners took these and sold the expensive ones to the Christians in their army cheaply. In glee they spread through each district, dividing up the churches and monasteries. May Christ reward the Christian princes Awag, Sahnšah, Vahram's son Albuka, pious Dop's son Grigor Xaçanc'i, and their troops. For these princes bought out of slavery as many men, women, and children, bishops, priest and eacons as was possible" (KG pp. 279-80); GA pp. 307, 309.
their base in Azarbaijan, but returned in springtime to crush the forces of the Saljuq sultan of Rûm, Ghiyâth al-Dîn Kai Khusrau at Köse Dagh/Chmankatuk near Erzinjan. The KG: "The sultan had left his usual place and had come to that part of Armenia which was under his domination, hard by a village called Chman-katuk.

"General Baiju, consistent with his deep knowledge, divided his soldiers into many fronts, putting foremost those under the brave commanders while the foreign troops composed of various nationalities who had come with them he divided so that they would not work any treachery" (KG p. 282); Vardan Arewelc'i's account of the taking of western Armenia is quite brief, mentioning neither the Armeno-Georgian auxiliaries nor the tactics used in battle: "88. Now in the year 1243 Baiju-noyin replaced the authority of Chormaghun and took the city of Karin, taking thence Umek, a man venerable, wealthy (mecatun) and fearful of the Lord, as well as his relations, the sons of paron Yohann, Step'annos and his five brothers. In 1244 [Baiju conquered] the whole territory of Rûm and the notable cities, first Caesarea, then Sebastia [whose people] were spared destruction since they had submitted early, then Erznka which was mercilessly destroyed and enslaved, for it had resisted. [The Mongols also took] many lands and districts where especially the Armenian people [were to] dwell in distress" (VA p. 147).

GA: "The commander of the army was Baiju-noyin, a man successful in battle, achieving many victories wherever he met resisters. But the causes of victory were the Armenian and Georgian princes who were in the front lines and launched themselves with a mighty blow against the enemy. Then, after them, came the T'at'ars, with bow and arrow". Georgians were not only fighting on the Mongols' side. Aknerc'i notes that the son of Salue, who had been with the sultan of Rûm for a long time, fought in the sultan's army. "When the battle waxed fierce, the courageous and renowned son of Salue put to flight the T'at'ars and killed many of them". Aknerc'i also praises the fighting ability of Aðbu'a, son of Vahram, granson of Plu Zak'are, fighting on the Mongols' side. At nightfall the battle of Chmankatuk ended. The next morning the Mongols discovered that Ghiyath al-Din had fled (GA pp. 307-309).

Het'um's unusual account of the taking of eastern Asia Minor shows numerous marks of a writer not well acquainted with the details. In chp. 18, "Regarding Ögedei, Second Khan of the Tatars" he recounts a number of Mongol battles with "the Turks", but Het'um appears to have merged Jalal al-Din with the sultan of Rum. After 10,000 Mongols were put to flight by the Turks, Ögedei sent general Baiju (Payton) "with 30,000 Tatar soldiers called damak or reconnaissance troops...Now when Baiju with the 30,000 soldiers reached the kingdom of the Turks, travelling day by day, he learned that the sultan from whom the first Tatars had fled had died, and that his son named K'iadati (? Ghiyath ) had succeeded him. When the former heard about the coming of the Tatars he was horrified and summoned as many mercenary troops as he could from foreigners and from the Latins. He had in his service among others, 2,000 Latins led by two commanders named Yohanes Liminad from Cyprus, and the other, Vonipakios born in Genoa. [The Turkish sultan] also sent to neighboring sultans promising anyone who came favors and gifts. And thus gathering a great multitude of warriors, he went to the place where the Tatars were encamped. However the Tatars were in no way disturbed. Instead they valiantly waged war as far as Konsedrak. In the end the Tatars were the victors and the Turks were defeated in a masterly fashion. In this way the Tatars captured the kingdom of the Turks in the year of Our Lord 1244 (Het'um pp. 40-41).

The EC relates the conquest of western Armenia and the sending to the Mongols by Rusudan of her son David as events occurring simultaneously. Queen Rusudan sent as messengers to the Mongols Sahnsah, Awag, Vahram, and the erist'av (duke) of Heret'i, Sota. "While the queen was sending her son [to the Mongols], they had decided to campaign against the great sultan Ghiyath al-Din, by origin a Saljuq, master of Rum, to subjugate him. They sent Baiju-novin who took with him the very greatest princes of Georgia. When they reached the countries of Sebastia and Erznka, they started to loot". The sultan approached the Mongols with an army of 400,000 (!) commanded by two Georgians, "Sarvaršis-je of Abxazia called Dard who had great renown from the very first for his bravery and had remained firm in the faith; and with him was P'ardavlay son of Salva Axalc'ixeli-T'or-eli, who had fled to the sultan and was a brave man renowned in warfare "(KC pp. 191-92; Mur. pp. 76-77). The KC then describes the boasting of Mongol subject Sargis Jael, Ivarlvare's grandson before Baiju. The Georgians were all appointed as advance-attackers. "Now the Georgians fought better and more bravely than any. A fierce battle ensued and countless men were killed on the sultan's side, including Sarvaršis-je called Dard Abxaz, their general. The sultan's army took to flight and the Tatars and Georgians
The defeat of the Saljuqs at Köse Dagh was an event of the greatest significance for the Armenians both locally, and abroad in the independent state of Cilicia. Like dominoes the remaining key cities of central Asia Minor fell: Erzinjan, Caesarea, Sebastia/Sivas, Melitene/Malatya, and Divriği. In 1245 Baiju captured Xlat', Amida, Edessa, pursued, killing numberless warriors and taking captives. But Axalc'ixel was killed by the sultan for revenge against the Georgians. The Georgians and Tatars swelled up with all sorts of extraordinary cloths and clothing, and so many horses, asses and camels that it is impossible to count them" (KC p. 194; Mur. p. 78).
and Nisibis\textsuperscript{1}. By that year the Armenian populations, be they in Caucasian Armenia, western Armenia, southern Armenia, or even Cilician Armenia were to a greater or lesser degree all formally under the overlordship of the Mongols. A unique situation had been created.

During the more than 100 years of Mongol domination, the Armenians experienced periods of benevolent, even enlightened, rule and of capricious, benighted misrule. From 1236-43 Mongol rule resulted in little if any radical change in the lives of Caucasian Armenians. As was mentioned above, many if not most of the naxarars retained control of their lands. Probably Mongol garrisons were maintained in the key cities, but, as was the case during the Saljuq conquests, it seems unlikely that there would have been enough troops to police all areas. During this early period the sources unanimously note that the Mongols returned each winter to the warm Mūghān plain of Āzarbāijān, so for part of the year the majority of them were outside of Armenia (though hardly very far away). Apparently, prior to 1243 no permanent Once more they took Konya and Axšar with all the greatest villages and monasteries. Then they attacked Sewast and took it, warring. But they did not kill them, rather they took their goods as booty" (GA pp. 307-309).

\textsuperscript{1} HAP III p. 612; SEPHA p. 111; KG pp. 292-93.

\textsuperscript{2} See following page, note 1.
formal taxes had been imposed on Armenia, the conquerors contenting themselves instead with the rich booty and plunder to be had from the many areas taken by military force. But the sources maintain that in 1243 by command

1  HAP III ch . 36 pp. 614-27; L.H. Babayan, "Hayastana mon^olakan tirapetut van afaizin arijanum [Armenia in the First Period of the Mongol Domination]", p. 617; SEPHA pp. 119-26; Kirakos has a number of valuable remarks about early Mongol administrative-fiscal policies in Armenia and Georgia prior to Arghun's census of 1243/44. When speaking about the battle for certain eastern Armenian fortresses in 1236, he says: "Meanwhile the army of foreigners battled with the fortresses. Those inside them unwillingly provided the Mongols with horses, livestock and whatever else they demanded. The Mongols placed taxes over them and left them in their name" (KG p. 243). Chp. 24 describes the capture of Vanakan vardapet and his student, the author himself. When the Mongols were besieging the cave where Vanakan was holed up, the following message was relayed: "From outside the enemies shouted: 'Why do you want to die? Come out to us, we shall give you overseers and leave you in your places'. They repeated this a second and third time, with pledges" (KG p. 244). Upon the conclusion of Molar-novin's interview with Vanakan, "Molar-novin ordered him to bring down the people of the fortress there fearlessly and he promised that each would be left in his place with his overseers and that he would build villages and fields (agaraks) in his name" (KG p. 246). Some of the captives, however, such as Kirakos and Vanakan were not "left in their places": "...Then they selected men from among us who could go about with them. The rest they ordered taken to the monastery and to the village and left their overseers there so that no one else would search them" (KG p. 248). That same year (1236) the Mongols took Lori whose prince, Sahnsah had fled: "They discovered the treasures of prince Sahnsah which those obedient to him had taken and robbed, and the T'at'ars constructed there a sturdy treasury which no one could see, since they made the mouth of the pit narrow enough that it was sufficient only for casting treasure in, but not for taking anything out" (KG p. 253). "...Then they came to Sebastia and since the inhabitants of the city had surrendered in advance--coming out to them with gifts and presents--no one was blamed, although a part of the city was looted. Conquering the city in their own name they set up overseers and left" (KG p. 283). VA and SO have nothing to say on this topic.

Grigor Aknerc'i's first mention of an administrative deed follows the agreement of the princes to pay the mal and tagar taxes and to contribute soldiers to the army: “The Tat’ars, agreeing to this, left off killing and destroying the land. They then returned to their place, the Mughan country. However, they left a chief named Ėara Buğa to demolish all the country’s fortresses which they had taken. They destroyed to the foundations the impregnable fortresses built by the Tačiks at great cost” (GA p. 296). While in Mughan, the three commanders Chormaghun, Ben¿ and Mular held a quriltai at night with the latter two urging the killing of all the population in a new expedition. Chormaghun, however, urged peace: “There has been enough destruction and killing in the land. Let it remain cultivated (šen). They can cultivate it, giving half for us to live on, from the vineyards and fields, and keeping half for themselves” (GA p. 298). Mysteriously, the next day, two of the warlike commanders were found dead. Chormaghun, the survivor, went to “Chingiz” and explained. The Khan mentions that it is God’s will for the Mongols to take the world, maintain order, impose the yasax and collect ěliu, mal tatar, and štür taxes. The Khan gave Chormaghun his wife Ayıt’ana khatun and sent him back to the Caucasus, to Mughan, with 110 chiefs: “Then they held a quriltai (xufut’ay) and a great council at Chormaghun’s order, and they divided the countries among the 110 chieftains. Dividing the land into three parts, one group went north, one south and one directly through the country…

“Now the names of those chieftains who remained in the middle of the country were: Asut’u-novin who was the oskr (? “bone”, “relative”) of the Khan; Çałatay who was called khan; Sanit’ay; another junior Çałatay; Baçu-novin(Baiju) whom they placed as the head of all the troops; Asar-novin; Hut’tu-novin; T’ut’tu-novin; Aygawt’ay-novin; Xojar-novin; Xurumći-novin; Xunan-novin; T’enal-novin; Angurag-novin.

“These same 13 chiefs divided amongst themselves the land of Georgia and Albania, mountain and plain. And they brought the great House of Chormaghun to Ganjak šahastan which previously was destroyed but later restored” (GA p. 302).

Aknerc’i next describes the capture of Vanakan, the destruction of Karin/Erzerum, the victory of Chmantakuk and following that the capture of Erzınjan “where they left šahna (guards)” (GA p. 310), the destruction of Caesarea, and the capture of Konya and Axsar. “Then they attacked Sebastia and took it by seige, but they did not kill the population. Rather, they took their belongings as booty, counted the men, imposed their customary mal and štük taxes, left šahna and chieftains for the country of Rum”, and returned to Azerbaijan (GA p. 312).

According to the KC, the first administrative move made by the Mongols occurred after Awag’s submission. “He went to Chormaghun, Chaghatai, Bijo (Baiju?) and Yusur who saw [him] and honored him, became intimately acquainted and appointed guards for [his] cities. In their language these are called šan”. Subsequently Şahnşah submitted: of the Great Khan Ghiyāk himself, taxes amounting to between 1/30th and 1/10th ad valorem, were imposed on virtually everything movable and immovable and a heavy head tax of 60 silver drams was collected from males.

"They appointed guards for the interior of the country" (KC p. 190; Mur. p. 75). The capture and killing of the disobedient continued until finally Iwane C'ixisjvarel-Jakeli submitted: "Iwane went and met Ghaghatai who received him with honor and appointed guards for the country.

"When they had secured the entire land in this fashion, they divided it among the four rulers (noyins) as well as (included in the division) all the erist ava(dukes), their incomes and taxes which they took and sent. In this way the country began to be pacified, gradually" (KC p. 191; Mur. p. 76).

The subsequent chronology here seems to be somewhat confused. The KC next describes the campaign against Ghiyath al-Din, adding: "while the queen was sending her son [to the Mongols], harassed by the fighting [and after the capture of Konya], the sultan requested peace and promised to pay heavy and great taxes, and giving many gifts, huge gems, pearls, he calmed them down and requested guards. And for a certain time they would have no sultan until the best was chosen" (KC pp. 194-95; Mur. pp. 77-78).

1 HAP III p. 620; CAMA pp. 365-66; VT pp. 88,91. KG's information is found in his chp. 44: "As soon as Khan Ghiyāk took control of the great kingdom of the T'at'ar army in their own land, he forthwith sent out tax-collectors to his troops in various lands and regions which they had subdued, to take 1/10th (tasanord) of all the military property as well as taxes from the districts and kingdoms conquered by them: from the Persians, Taikha, Armenians, Georgians, Albanians, and from all peoples under them" (KG pp. 311-12). The chiefs of the tax-collectors were Arghun and Buqa, the latter even confiscating goods from a terrified Mongol nobility: "Yet no one dared say anything to him, for he had assembled brigands from among the Persians and Taikha who mercilessly performed deeds of cruelty and were especially inimical toward the Christians.

"Therefore they provoked him against the pious prince Hasan Jalal. [Buqa] seized him in the great court, before all the nobles and subjected him to numerous punishments. He demolished [Hasan's] inaccessible fortresses: the one called in Persian Xoyaxana, Ded, Ciranak'ar and his other fortresses. And they so levelled them that not even a trace appeared that anything had ever been built there. Taking much gold and silver from [Hasan] they barely spared
The severity of the taxes and the brutal manner of their collection triggered an abortive uprising of the naxarar/didebuls in 1248/49. This rebellion, which was discovered by the Mongols while still in the planning stages was crushed at the expense of human and animal lives and crops in numerous districts of northeastern Armenia and southern Georgia. Some of the arrested Armenian and Georgian conspirators, unable to raise the huge ransoms demanded for their release were tortured or killed. But the main his life. The great nobility (mecamec awagani) could do nothing to help him, so thrown into fear were all the spectators" (KG p. 313). Buqa also planned to seize the prince of princes Awag, but the great nobility (presumably Mongol nobility) urged him to visit Buqa with his large personal army, saying: "Should [Buqa] happen to seize you, then you attack him". Seeing Awag's troops the frightened Buqa asked: "What is that multitude of soldiers for? Could it be that you are rebelling from the Khan and have come to kill us"? Buqa then spoke to Awag of peace, while simultaneously plotting against him. But before Buqa was able to actualize his designs, he died of disease (KG p. 314).

Grigor Aknerci does not mention the census of 1243 directly. However, describing the taking of Sebastia/Sivas in 1244 he writes: "But they did not kill them, rather took their treasures as booty and registered the populace and imposed taxes on them according to their custom, the mal and t'alar. And leaving jahna (guards) and chiefs in the land of Rum..." (GA p. 312).

1 HAP III pp. 620-22; SEPHA pp. 131-32; CAMA p. 366; In chp. 47, "Concerning the Destruction Wrought by the T'at'ars in Georgia", Kirakos narrates the princes' rebellion of 1249/50: "While the land was recovering a little from the raids and plunderings stirred up by the earth-consuming fire...the princes deprived and robbed the poor, and from this extortion they bought expensive clothing and they dressed, ate, drank, and boasted greatly as is the arrogant custom of Georgia" (KG p. 318). Kirakos rebukes those who "do not learn from the past", and he considers the instigator of the rebellion to be Satan. "...Suddenly all the nobility of the T'at'ar army held a council, armed, and wanted universally to ravage the lands of Armenia and Georgia, [lands] obedient to them, because the Georgian
The king wanted to rebel with all the princes, and [the Mongols] were recruiting to come and destroy them, since it was apparent that all the princes were going for a levee to the king of Georgia, Dawit, in Tiflis.

"And while they were drinking wine, their spirits rose and an immature man among them said: 'Having such a multitude of troops, why do we serve [the Mongols]? Come, let us fall upon them suddenly, destroy and exterminate them, and we shall have our lands'.

"The great prince Awag intercepted this plot. And the T'at'ar army happening to be in the place was informed about it, and the army notified its chiefs.

"As soon as the forces of the princes each went to its own place thus armed, they [the Mongols] wanted generally to destroy everyone. The princes they found with them, they arrested and to those who were not there they sent summons for them to come in haste...

"...One of the senior leaders, general Chaghatai, head of the entire army and a friend of Awag, came amidst the armed troops and said to them: 'We have no order from the Khan to kill those who are obedient to us, stand in service to us, and pay taxes to the Khan. And the reality of their rebellion is not certain. But if we destroy them without cause you will be responsible to the Khan'. Hearing this they ceased following the matter.

"The mother of Awag, named Xošak, went to them to assure them of her son's loyalty to them and that he soon would be coming—which in fact happened, since prince Awag quickly came up and demonstrated his intimacy with them by many testimonies.

"King Dawit' and the other princes arrives. [The Mongols] bound all of them tightly, according to their custom, hand and foot, with thin cords. They left them bound thus for three days, ridiculing and insulting them for their arrogance and rebellious plans. And they took all [the rebels'] horses, put a price on their heads, and left them. [The Mongols] attacked Georgia, falling upon many districts of the rebels and non-rebels. They cut down many people and took even more captive, a countless multitude of men, women, and children they drowned in the river. And this took place in 1249/50 (698 A.E.)" (KG pp. 319-20).

VA:"...For a census was conducted in 1243/44 by which they worked deeds worthy of lamentation and tears not merely for [the sake of] rational animals, but for dumb animals, mountains and plains, which were watered with blood and tears. This same lamentation was repeated in 1249/50 because Baiju and the other nobles got wind of the presumptuousness and rebelliousness of the king and the princes of Georgia. King Dawit' was arrested as were other grandees; they were bound and sentenced to death, though they were spared by concern from On High. Nonetheless, countless numbers were killed and enslaved, villages and fields [were destroyed], and they disgraced women in Armenia—-but more so in Georgia" (VA pp. 147-48).
Aknerc’i’s narration of the rebellion is found in his chap. IX. Like Kirakos, Aknerc’i noted that it was a Georgian custom to boast: “Now one of the Georgian princes counted the other princes in front of the king and declared the number of princes to be 1000. And some of the princes had 1000 horsemen for battle, while some had 500. The news of this spread throughout the entire kingdom, while they carelessly ate and drank. When they had counted and taken stock of the Armenian and Georgian forces, they said that their side would vanquish the Tat’ar troops. And they divided the chiefs amongst themselves. But this was not spoken straightforwardly, rather, in jest, for they were at leisure and free from care, and there was no enemy in the eastern land besides the Tat’ars who kept coming and through taxation harassing the Georgian and Armenian princes. From some they demanded gold cloth, from some falcons, from some ašek (“well-bred”) dogs and horses. And in this way they harassed them over and above the mal, t’ašar and xalan” (GA p. 320). Aknerc’i says that a certain unnamed traitorous prince went and informed the Mongols.

“Now they, believing these false words, turned against the land, taking as plunder all the goods and flocks. But they did not kill people, [being] without orders from the great Khan. They seized the king and all the princes of the nation, while they even took to the court of the chieftain the great prince of Georgia, Awag, At’abak [Iwan’s] son, on a litter, since he had fallen ill in those days and was unable to ride a horse. Although the other princes and the king spoke a great deal, they did not believe them, and did not cease making captives and looting the land. But when they took Awag on a litter to the court of the Tat’ar chieftain(s) he spoke and was believed; they left off destroying the land and made peace with the terrified and pitiful Christians” (GA p. 322).

Step‘anno Orbelean omits any reference to the princes’ rebellion. The account in the KC for the period 1243-50 is extremely confused chronologically. Dating, as usual, is absent, and beyond this, many events are telescoped. The chronicler laments the confused state of affairs following the death of queen Rusudan in 1247. During this time, the Georgian army was obliged to fight each year against the Assassins at Alamut, to fulfill military service to the Mongols. Furthermore, with the country kingless, Turks began attacking the Vaharšert area. Then, with Georgia in confusion, the Georgian princes assembled at Koxta‘avi, complaining about their yearly fighting obligations at Alamut. They decided to rebell against the Mongols. Present were Egarslan, Dadiani, Vahram of Gag, Ivar’vare, Sot’a Kupar, T’or’ian, the Her-Kaxet’is, the K’art’lec’is, Gamerkel T’oreli, Sargis T’mogveli, the Mesxs and people of Tao. However the nobins Baiju and Angurag arrested those at Koxta and sent them to Sirakavan, where Chormaghun had them bound. They claimed they had assembled to pay the kharaj tax. But they were not released until one of the causes of the unrest remained unaddressed by the Mongols.

After the accession of the Great Khan Möngke (1251-59) a thorough census was made of all parts of the empire during 1252-57. The Iranian emir Arghun personally conducted the census of Caucasia in 1254. Although the study made by Arghun has not survived, modern scholars estimate the Armenian population of Greater Armenia (excluding Cilicia) to have been about 4 million in the mid-13th century. The thoroughness of Arghun's work boded ill for Armenian laborers. Kirakos Ganjake'i instigators, C'otne Dadiani, came all the way from Abkazia voluntarily, and repeated the same story (KC pp. 211-16; Mur. pp. 90-94).

1 SMP pp. 339-40.

2 HAP III p. 625; VA p. 148 merely mentions the census. Aknerc'i provides information not met with in the other Armenian sources: "In one small village [the Mongols] counted 30 or 50 men all from 15 to 60 years of age. They took 60 spitaks from each person counted. When they captured one who had fled or hid, they cruelly tied his hands back and beat him with green rods until his body was all cut and caked with blood. Then they pitilessly let loose their ferocious dogs, which they had trained to eat human flesh, and they let them devour the miserable and impoverished Christians" (GA p. 325). The KC, though somewhat confused, has a passage which appears to relate to the census of 1254. It characterizes Arghun, strangely, as a just, honest adviser, quite the opposite of the Armenian sources. First Arghun was sent to the domains of Batu, north of the Caucasus: "to survey and record those soldiers and warriors who had gone with the senior and junior noyins campaigning, and to stipulate according to their worth the uluf, which is a gift for those who have taken to the road and recompense for horse and saddle" (KC p. 234; Mur. p. 107). Arghun then went to Qubilai-Khan in China where he engaged in the same work. "When he reached Hülegü-Khan, the latter received him with honor and sent him to Georgia to king David, then on described it as follows:

[Census-takers] also reached the lands of Armenia, Georgia, Albania, and the districts around them, and began recording all those from 11 years and up, excepting the women. And they demanded the most severe taxes, more than a man could bear. And people became impoverished. They harassed the people with unbelievable beatings, torments, and tortures. Those who hid were seized and killed. Those who were unable to pay the rate had their children taken to pay their debt, for [the census-takers] circulated around with Persian Muslim attendants... all the artisans, whether in the cities or in villages were taxed. Furthermore, fishermen of the seas and lakes, miners and blacksmiths and painters/plasterers [were taxed] ...And they alone profitted. They took all the salt mines in Košba and in other regions.

Arghun similarly profitted greatly from the merchants and heaped up vast quantities of gold, silver, and precious stones. Thus everything became expensive and the lands became filled with lamentation and complaints. Then he left in charge of the lands a wicked governor (ostikan) who demanded the same amount every year by list, and in writing.

to Rûm to survey all of his holdings. When Arghun reached Georgia, all the inhabitants of David's kingdom were greatly menaced. They started surveying people and beasts fields, and plants, vineyards and vegetable gardens. From [each] 9 land-owning peasants it was ordered that 1 soldier should be provided. Thus David's kingdom provided by census to the Tatârs 9 dumans, which is 9 x 10,000. [From each village] they stipulated gifts: to the Thousander one lamb and one drahkan (?); to the Ten Thousander, one sheep and two drahkan; for the horseman (?) 3 tetrës daily ("a silver coin"). He so stipulated and then went to Hum Baghdad, and everywhere" (KC pp. 234-35; Mur. pp. 107-108).

KG pp. 362-63: "ew zamenavn aruestageva, et 'e i k'akh's ew et 'e i giwia, zamenavn i harki kac u c in. Ayi ew zcovaks, ew bliçe jknosac', ew zerkat ahans, ew zdarbins, ew Zsparars...ew ink 'e semei miayn sahein. ew zamenavn a'ahansn a'fin, or i Košb ew or yayl kołmans kołmans. "Na ew i vačarakanac bazum inc saheal, kutec 'in ganja sastik a oswoy ew arcat 'oy ew akanc, patuakanac. Ew ayasper zamenavn slić u c. eal ew yayl ew aškarov le eal zaškarha, t'oki čar ostikans i veray aškarvas' e zcyn pahanjel vamenavn a'mi, novin hamarow ew grov".
Another administrative change occurred regarding Armenia in the mid-13th century. This was the establishment of the Il-Khanid Mongol state over the territory of Iran, and the inclusion of Caucasus into it, beginning in 1256. Prior to that time the Caucasus had formed a single administrative unit composed of five vilayets. Of these five, the first two were areas of Armenian population, namely 1) the Gurjistani (Georgian) vilayet, and 2) the vilayet of Greater Armenia. The Gurjistani vilayet consisted of eight tumans or districts each capable of providing 10,000 soldiers. Three of the eight tumans in the first vilayet were Armenian and included Ani, Kars, northeasternmost Armenia, Siwnik1 and Arc'ax. The second vilayet, that of Greater Armenia embraced some of the quasi-independent Armenian principalities, such as the Mamikonean/T'ornikeans of Sasun and the Arcrunid Xedenek-eans of Vaspurakan. The center of this vilayet was Karin/Erzerum1.

Following the granting of Iran as a hereditary appanage to Hülegü-Khān in 1256, the situation was somewhat altered. First, Hülegü chose as his residence Mughān in Āzarbāiǰān which until then had been the camping grounds of Baiju-noyin. Hülegü ordered the latter and all the nomadic Mongol and Turkmen warriors subordinate to him to evacuate the Caucasus, in order to create room for his own entourage. With considerable grumbling the displaced Baiju and his hosts moved westward, sacking the cities of Erzerum, Erzinjan Sivas, Caesarea and Konya as they went. Almost simultaneously some of Chingiz-Khan's grandchildren descended on the Caucasus through the Caspian Gates in order to settle near their relation, Hülegü.

---

1 CAVA p. 366; PT pp. 275-76; Bar Hebraeus describes Hülegü's entourage (BH p. 419) and Baiju's move (BH p. 424). In 1256 the Melitene/Malatya area was attacked by Turkmens (BH p. 425) as well as by Baiju (BH pp. 426-27). The same author (p. 427) reports cannibalism in that city; KG p. 375; GA: "After this, when the year 706 A.E. (=1257/58) had come, there arrived from the East, where the great Khan was, 7 of the Khan's sons, each with a duman of cavalry and a duman is 30,000 [incorrect. The duman was 10,000]. They were named as follows: the first and greatest of them was Hulawu, who was a brother of Manku khan. The second, Xul, called himself the brother of God and was not ashamed. The third was Balaxe, the fourth Tut'ar, the fifth, T'agudar, the sixth, Latakan, and the seventh, Bawralan. They were in disagreement amongst themselves, but were very fearless and eaters of men. On their journey they all came and travelled about in wagons, while they levelled the mountains and hills of the eastern country to facilitate the movement of their wagons and carts" (GA p. 327). Of the leaders mentioned by GA, Xul it seems became a bandit and attacked certain monasteries in "the interior of the country". The monastery of Gereti is mentioned especially (GA pp. 327, 329, 331).

KC: "Hülegü arrived in Atrpatakan with 60,000 troops. Learning about this, the nobins Chormaghun, Yusur, Baiju, and Angurak went to meet him, taking with them all the nobles of Georgia, especially Egarslan, to whom the entire Georgian nobility submitted, as if to a king. They met in Atrpatakan. Two [bodies] of Tatars were [thus] assembled: those who had come there before [i.e., at the time of the conquest of the Caucasus], who were called t'amber, and those who had come with Hülégü-Khan...

"They came to the place known as Ala-Tagh[east of Lake Van in southern historical Armenia]. All his subjects came before him. He sat on the throne of the Khanate and they congratulated him according to their custom and called him Khan..." (KC pp. 222-23; Mur. p. 98).
This unruly group also caused much damage as it travelled, and extorted whatever it could from the sedentary population\(^1\). The establishment of the Įl-Khānid state in 1256 brought about yet another change, albeit one somewhat more difficult to evaluate than the damage occasioned by nomads on the move. In the pre-Įl-Khānid period, those Armenian naxarars heading tumans in the two Caucasian vilayets had had direct access to the Great Khān of the Mongol empire in Qara-Qorum. Now, with the establishment of the Įl-Khānate (itself a vassal of the Great Khāns) these same nobles became as it were sub-vassals whose direct access to supreme and ultimate power was lost\(^2\). On the other hand

\(^1\) KG: "To this Khān [Hülegū] went the very greatest chiefs from Batu's region: Żūl, Balaża, Tūthar, Latażan, for everyone honored Hülegū like a Khan. They obeyed him and feared him" (KG p. 377); KC: "During the same period other khāns sent their sons to these parts. Called koun, they were: Batu's son Tur, Chaghatai-Khan's son Uṣan, Żūl, and from the T'ul clan, Bolā, in order that the khāns' sons rule the lands they arrived in and also take the taxes. Ögedei-Khan's grandson Hülegū, brother of Qubilai-Khan had come forth and was here [in the Caucasus]. When Hülegū saw these three kouns he received them and gave them the lands due, and thus did they remain in peace" (KC pp. 223-24; Mur. p. 99).

\(^2\) CAMA pp. 367-68.
the proximity of new powerful masters as of 1256, plus the information obtained by them from the census of 1254 had yet another immediate ramification for the Caucasus.
Now the naxarara were obliged to participate in all military ventures of the Il-Khānids on a regular ongoing basis, providing a specified number of troops yearly. Armenian and Georgian warriors fought in all the major Mongol campaigns in the Middle East from 1256 onward. This in turn resulted in the deaths or enslavements of large numbers of Christian Caucasians abroad, and, secondly in the absence of native defenders within the Caucasus itself, where they were needed to protect that area from the persistent raids and sorties of Mongols, Turks, and local rebels.

Heavy taxation, coupled with the onerous burden of military service in distant lands led, not unexpectedly, to rebellion. The second Armenia-Georgian rebellion occurred between 1259 and 1261. Though of longer duration than the rebellion of 1248/49, this one too eventually was brutally crushed.

1 On the participation of Caucasian nobles in Il-Khānid warfare, see ch. 3.

2 HAP III, ch. 37, "Hayastane Hulayvan išxanut'yan tirapetut yan nerk o [Armenia under Hulaguid Domination]" Kirakos' information is found in his ch. 63, "Concerning the Death of Pious Prince Jalal": "Now the king of Georgia, Dawit', son of Laša, who was subject to the T'at'ars, was placed into straits and wearied by the numerous and impossibly heavy taxes demanded of him, of all the princes, and of all the lands, which they could not bear. He left his city Tiflia, his throne, and everything he owned and fled to the depths of Ap'xazia and the fortresses of Suanet'ia. With him went many other great princes of districts who were harassed and harried, bankrupt, and who had mortgaged cities and districts but were still unable to satiate the evil leech-like appetite [of the Mongols]. So fraught, Dawit' fled, but he was unable to take with him his wife queen Gonč'a and his newborn son Demetre. He took along only his first born son Giorgi" (KG p. 389).

Arghun pursued him, but was unable to catch up. He destroyed and enslaved many Georgian districts, destroying the mausolea of the kings at Gelati and the kat'ošikosate at Ac'hor. Suddenly some 400 Georgian cavalry appeared and scared off the Mongols. "And Arghun became frightened and dared not so brazenly enter and search places. He returned to Hülegü planning wickedness in his heart. He seized the Georgian queen Gonč'a, her daughter Xošak, the great prince Sahnšah, Hasan Jalal the lord of Xašen and many others because of debts and taxes [owed]. These people gave much treasure and barely saved their lives." (KG p. 390). However Hasan Jalal was executed in 1261/62.

"Now it happened that Zak'are [Sahnšah's son] was with Arghun and his many troops in Georgia. And Zak'are went unbeknown to Arghun and the other soldiers to see his wife who was with her father Sargis, prince of Uxteac', one of the rebels with the Georgian king Dawit'. When Arghun learned about this, he notified Hülegü who himself ordered that Zak'are be taken shackled. He heaped other false accusations upon him, ordered him killed, dismembered and thrown to the dogs" (KG p. 393).

VA notes that Zak'are, the sparapet of Georgia..."was falsely accused with delaying in going to court at the set time he was supposed to" (VA p. 153); Interestingly, SO says nothing about this rebellion, either. KG pp. 238-49, passim; Mur. pp. 110-21, passim.
Dealing with the rebellions of subject peoples and waging war against Muslim powers in the Near East were not the only military operations occupying Il-Khanid generals. Beginning with 1261, the Caucasus became an occasional theater of warfare between Il-Khanids and yet another Mongol state, that of the Golden Horde centered in the lower Volga with its capital at Sarai. The organizer of this state, Berke-Khan (1257-66) a devout Muslim, was outraged by the anti-Muslim policies of the shamanist Hülegü and especially by his massacre of the Muslim population of Baghdad in 1258. Not only did Berke and his successors attempt to infringe on the uncertain boundary between his realm and Hülegü's (i.e., the Caucasus), but they also entered into an alliance with the increasingly powerful Mamlûk state in Egypt. The latter were the most ferocious enemies of the Il-Khanids in the Near East, and the only power to have dealt the Mongols a severe military defeat there in 1260.

1 Spuler pp. 21-25; 27-29; SMP pp. 352-54; CTA'v. 3 p. 218 foldout; KG pp. 395-96; VA's account on p. 153 is merely a chronological list derived from KG; SO p. 161; KG pp. 249-54; Mur. pp. 121-25.

2 Spuler p. 20; SMP pp. 351-52; Het'um p. 53.
During the reign of Hulegu's son and successor Abaqa (1265-82) more examples of centrifugation among the Mongols became manifest. In the very first year of his rule, Abaqa was obliged to deal with another invasion of the Caucasus from Berke. With the latter's death in Tiflis in 1266, the troops of the Golden Horde retreated.

---

1 Spuler p. 26; KG's text ends with an incomplete description of this invasion, p. 399; VA chp. 98: "Now at the beginning of 1266/67, the governor of the North named Berke (Bark'a) who had held the position of Batu and Sartakh and was a Muslin, heard about the death of great Hulegu and he came with a multitude [of troops] to the Kur river to display his forces to the troops on this side of the river--troops of Abaqa and his brother Ismud, to show that he was alive after the death of their father. And Berke came and trampled them with little care, as far as Hezen. All the Muslims there prayed in joy. But those [people] on this side were terrified by this and walled off the length of the river called Sibar and kept in all readiness throughout the winter. Then Berke, having lost hope, returned to his place. And in the summertime he died. They say that in behavior he was not an agitator, and that he loathed blood-letting" (VA p. 162).

2 KG: "During this period the great Khan Berke came forth on the Darband highway to avenge [the deaths of] Xut'ar, Balal-, and Lul. Learning of this, Abaqa-Khan summoned his army and king David, and set out. But when he realized the size of Berke's army and its might, he did not cross the Kur, but went up the banks, leaving troops where the Kur and the Arax join, from there to Mczet'a. Berke ravaged the Shirvan country, Heret'i, Kaxet'i, and the whole bank of the Iori. The army came as far as Tiflis. Countless Christians were killed, while Berke-Khan encamped in the Garej mountains. Then God pitied the land and Abaqa-Khan. Berke was seized with some sort of illness and he died. Now his troops when they saw their Khan's decease, picked up the corpse and passed through the Darband Gates. So the land was pacified" (KG pp. 254-55; Mur. p. 126). SMP p. 356.
No sooner had this situation been resolved, however than one of Chingiz-Khān's great grandsons, Tegüder, rebelled in 1268. Tegüder's holdings included parts of southern Georgia and the Gelarkunik' area around Lake Sewan in Armenia. Armeno-Georgian troops aided in the suppression of this rebellion, just as they had fought for the Īl-Khāns against Berke. In both instances the Armenian and Georgian agriculturalists were the primary losers, since

1 HAP III p. 632; SEPHA pp. 161-62; SMP p. 357: According to the KC, in the period prior to the death of king David (d.1270), Tegüder, brother of Baraq-Khan of Turan, rebelled against Abaqa. The latter had granted Tegüder summer camping grounds on the Ararat mountains, wintering quarters on the bank of the Arax plus Naxijewan, and tax-collecting rights over the country belonging to Baraq there. Tegüder and his brother unsuccessfully plotted to overthrow Abaqa. When the plot failed, Tegüder went to Savseti and Ašaria in Georgia and persuaded the lord Sargis Jaleli to allow him to pass through. Meanwhile Abaqa sent a force including Sahnā's son Iwane the mandat'urt'uxuc'es and under the command of Chormaghun's son Shiremūn, in pursuit. Tegüder was defeated and lost many men in a landslide. However he and the survivors managed to reach David in Kutais where he was royally entertained. "Frequently king David went to Tegüder and managed all the rituals and ceremonies, and so served before him....The same was done by the queen, the daughter of the great Palaeologus, ruler of Constantinople" (KC pp. 261-62; Kur. p. 133). Now as soon as Shiremūn returned to Abaqa with the good news that Tegüder was out of the way, a road-guard on the Khorasan highway arrived saying that Baraq was on the move. Abaqa summoned David and the Georgian army and they went, with the Georgians serving as advance-attackers. While this was going on, Tegüder sent three commanders to raid Javacet'i. Tegüder then ravaged K'art'li (KC pp. 265-66; Mur. pp. 135-37).

2 HAP III p. 632; Allen p. 117; GA ch. XVI pp. 375-77.
their particular districts were expected to feed and accommodate one or another party of Mongols, yet as a consequence of this were ravaged by the mutually inimical Mongol armies as punishment for aiding enemies.

The situation outlined above continued more or less unchanged until the reign of Ghazan-Khan (1295-1304). For the rest of Abaqa's reign and during those of his successors Ahmad, Arghun, and Geikhatu, we see Armeno-Georgian forces fighting and suffering defeat from the Mamluks (1281); fighting the next year in the Far East against yet another Mongol state ruled by the descendants of Chingiz' grandson Chaghatai; and fighting the armies of the Golden Horde, which in 1287 once again attempted to invade Caucasus. In this period other woes befell the Armenians, both peasant and noble. As a result of the strengthening of the Muslim Mamluks in Egypt, Islamic Turkic elements in Asia Minor began to take heart, to form secret alliances with their co-religionists against the Mongols, and to loot and pillage whenever they thought they could succeed. The brunt of Turkmen violence was the

1 HAP III p. 634; SMP p. 363.
2 Ibid. KC p. 284; Mur. p. 152.
3 SMP pp. 370-71.
sedentary Christian population, especially the Armenians, who had distinguished themselves as Mongol supporters.

1 Het’um pp. 56-59; Abu’l-Fida (Nalb. p. 238); BH p. 454 describes the capture and robbery of a caravan of Christian merchants from Cilicia and Rum in 1276; "And at [this] time (1276) the captain of the host of the fortress of Zaid (Xarberd) whose name was Bishar, a wicked man and a shedder of blood, an old man, one hundred years old, made up his mind to flee to the Egyptians. For he had in his heart a hatred of Mar Sarkis the bishop of the Armenians in the city of Arzengan, who was a great man and who was honored by the king of the Huns (Mongols). He determined to kill him and then to go away. And, taking certain of his free men with him, he went to the country of Arzengan. He heard that the saint was in one of his monasteries preparing for Palm Sunday, and he lay in wait for him on the road. And when the holy man rose up on the second day [of the week] of the Sabbath of the Passion to go into the city, his son who was great and famous, was also with him. And he said unto the holy man, 'Do thou go into the city, and I want to go and occupy myself in such and such a village, where they want to consecrate the church which they have built'. And his father gave him permission to go, and he was not to stay too long. And when they had separated from each other, three Turkish horsemen came and met the holy man, and they dismounted and went to kiss his hand. And they said unto him, 'An ambassador hath come and he asketh for thee and thy son also to read the varlikh (i.e., a Mongol patent or administrative order) which he hath with him'. And the holy man said, 'My son hath gone to such and such a village, but behold I will come'. And when they had journeyed on a little farther, there fell upon them about two hundred Turkish horsemen, and they killed the holy man and the thirty souls, elders, monks, and other slaves, who were with him. And they cut off his head, and they took it and went and seized that village and they surrounded the church (wherein was the son of the holy man) very carefully. And when they entered the church they could not find him because there was a heap [of grain] there, and he had hidden himself inside it. And when they wanted to depart, one of those accursed infidels said, 'Let us set fire to this heap first, and then we will go forth'. And having set fire to it the young man came forth only half alive. And the Turks said unto him, 'Where is your father?' And he replied, 'He has gone into the city'. Then they cast down before him his [father's] head. And when he saw [it] he shrieked and fell down on the head of his father. And then and there, as he fell down, they hacked him limb from limb. And after these things that wicked old man Bishar took his sons and all his company of soldiers and departed to the lord of Egypt" (BH pp. 455-56). See also SA p. 162.

According to BH, in the late 13th century, bands of Turkmen, Mongols and Kurds were quite active in western Armenia and northern Syria to Cilicia. In 1282 nomadic Turkish bands were raiding around Karberd (p. 465); 1285 raiding Arbil (p. 475); 1288 Mongols and Kurds were warring near Mosul (p. 477); 1289 marauding around Melitene/Malatya (p. 483-84); in 1290 Mongols despoiled Kurdish farmers in Diyarbakr (p. 485); in 1291 Geikhatu went against the Turkmen of Rum (p. 492), but in 1295 the Mongols and Turkmens were still warring (p. 508):

Throughout the 13th century the Saljuqid state was constantly being undermined by uncontrollable Turkmen warriors, who in fact, eventually brought that state down. The sources note Turkmen rebellions/rampages in 1239-40, 1261-62, 1276, 1277, 1286, 1290 (see DMH pp. 134-35; PT pp. 279, 280, 282, 286-88, 291, 293, 295-97. C. Cahen has observed that the Turkmen benefitted from the disorganization of cohesive societies (PT p. 299). Elsewhere, discussing the ethnic evolution of Asia Minor he wrote: "There has already been occasion more than once to mention in passing the new peoples which the Mongols' invasion had driven into Asia Minor, at first by thrusting them back before their own advance, later by carrying them along in their own ranks. Some were Iranians, others Turkmen, and there were even Mongols who were not solely garrison troops, but who settled down with their livestock and families in the eastern half of the country. In terms of numbers, there thus ensued an increase—which is impossible to calculate—in these ethnic groups as compared with the stable numbers of the natives; and there were also certain qualitative modifications. Leaving aside the Mongols, the new Turkmen were not the exact counterparts of the old ones, economically and culturally"... (PT p. 314).

"The Oghuz are not the only Turkish people to have supplied Asia Minor with settlers. Among the Turkish tribes some of whose members settled down there with the Mongols, there were some who derived from other Turkish peoples, such as the Uighur. There can and indeed must have been an absorption of the Cumans/Qipchaqs whom Theodore Lascaris had installed on the southern frontiers of the State of Nicaea for the express purpose of resisting the Turkmen. Moreover, the Mongols, who at the start were an undifferentiated army of occupation, as their Empire disintegrated, themselves seem to have become divided and reorganized into groups of tribes. Some of these were named as being still in Anatolia at the end of the 14th century in the histories of the gadi Burhan al-Din or of the Karamanids sometimes being associated with the Turkmen, sometimes hostile to them, in eastern and central Anatolia, and emancipated from the princes even when the latter were Mongols. Finally, many Kurds had been displaced. The distribution of the tribes found in Diyarbakr in the 14th century was no longer the same as had been known hitherto, and was already as known in the 16th century. Moreover, it will be remembered, the Kurds penetrated into Armenian regions where they had never previously been recorded" (FT p. 316).
Ironically, in the late 13th century the Caucasian nazarar/didebuls too were punished—not by Turks—but by their own Mongol overlords. This must be explained by the very nearness of many lords to the Il-Khan court and their great intimacy with its members. Thus in 1289, when Arghun-Khan crushed a plot against him organized by the emir Buqa, he also executed king Demetre of Georgia who had married Buqa's daughter and was, rightly or wrongly, implicated. Similarly, when Geikhatu succeeded his brother Arghun as Khan in 1291, he in turn killed off Arghun's prominent supporters, among whom were many Armenians.

The reign of Ghazan-Khan (1295-1304) is regarded by Mongol scholars as a watershed, during which important changes took place. Some changes, such as the Islamization of the Mongols, were of a permanent nature. Others, such as fiscal reforms, were ephemeral and did not take root among Ghazan's successors.

2 HAP III p. 636. Arghun, of course, had done the same: SO p. 172. For the end of the 1290's (c. 1296) both Orbelean and the KC speak of depredations caused by Mongol rebels (SO pp. 217-20; KC pp. 297-300; Mur. pp. 163-65).
It is a known fact that at the time of the Mongol conquests in the early 13th century the Mongols were characterized by their religious tolerance, or perhaps, indifference. They themselves were for the most part shamanists, although some prominent families among them were Nestorian Christians, having received the faith from Syrian missionaries to Central Asia\(^1\). Consequently, throughout the 13th century, certain individual Mongol leaders exerted themselves to further certain Christian lords (both clerical and secular) subject to them. The Khans themselves adroitly manipulated the anti-Muslim sentiments of their Christian subjects for their own military and foreign policy objectives\(^2\). This situation changed with the Islamization first of Ahmad-Khan (1282-84), and then, irrevocably, with Ghazan's conversion. Christianity quickly passed from the status of a favored religion to that of a tolerated religion. Anti-Christian persecutions began almost at once, and though checked during part of Ghazan's reign, they became the rule rather than the exception under his intolerant successors\(^3\). Now that the

---

2. SMP pp. 370-71.

3. SMP pp. 379-80, 542. During the first part of Ghazan's reign, persecution was severe (SA p. 164). King Het'um of Cilician Armenia was able to calm Ghazan's wrath insatiable appetite for plunder of the Mongol nomad warriors could not be assuaged in successful wars against foreign enemies, it could at least be unleashed upon a new class of domestic enemies—the Christians. In Caucasus the "instrument of the anti-Christ" was a Persian Muslim named Nauruz, whose fanaticism seems to have been as much for the amassing of a personal fortune as for the promulgation of Islam temporarily, according to BH p. 506. Anti-Christian persecutions had occurred prior to Ghazan's reign, in 1286 in Mosul (BH p. 482). See Armenian Neo-martyrs, bishop Grigor Karneci (d. 1321/22) pp. 121-22.

Step'annos has recorded that Nauruz received Ghazan's permission to extirpate Christianity: "Within our borders, they robbed the churches of Naxijewan, enslaved and tormented the priests; and they hauled off the doors of the chapels and demolished the altars. However, the great chieftains did not allow those churches to be pulled down which were respected by the Georgian troops. They also came to the great [religious] seat of Siwnik' and wanted to pull down the church, but through bribes and violence we did not let them. They looted the monasteries in the district of Naxijewan, but the other Armenian lands on the other side of the Azax river were left alone, thank God" (SO p. 221). SO then describes how the Syrian Catholicos was tormented by the Mongols. King Het'um of Cilicia, enroute to Baidu was at the Syrian Catholicosate at the time: "They seized the bishop of Apostles' [church] lord Tirac'u and vilified him by various indignities, and took all of his things. As for his monastery which contained the sepulcher of the blessed apostle Thaddeus, they pulled down the structure, ruined, robbed, and totally destroyed it" (SO p. 221). King Het'um informed Baidu about the attacks, and he simply claimed that it was Nauruz' doing, that he was ignorant of the matter. A decree was promulgated permitting freedom of worship. Meanwhile the philo-Christian Kut'lušah married Baidu's daughter, and there was peace for Armenia. See also KC pp. 299-304; Mur. pp. 165-69.
His depredations in Georgia and Armenia provoked yet another rebellion which, like the two preceding ones, was crushed at the expense of extreme suffering to people, livestock, crops and property\(^1\). Religious persecution intensified during the second part of the reign of Ghazan’s successor, his brother Muḥammad Khudā-Banda ("servant of God", 1304-16). In 1307 Khudā-Banda, or Zarabanda ("servant of an ass") as the Armenian sources styled him, resumed collection of the jizya or head-tax on non-Muslims, something Ghazan had tried but was obliged to discontinue\(^2\). The sources report that even month-old children were registered for payment of the jizya\(^3\). Furthermore, Christians were now required to wear identifying patches of blue or black material on their clothing\(^4\).

---

\(^1\) HAP III p. 637; Rashīd III p. 171; SO pp. 224-25.

\(^2\) SKP p. 533; HAP III pp. 640-41; 14CC #55 p. 41.

\(^3\) Ališan, Hayapatum, p. 526; 14CC p. 104.

\(^4\) SA p. 165 and BH p. 507 state that already in Ghazan’s day this practice was adopted and included the Jews, who never had been a protected people under the Mongols. SA p. 168; 14CC #178 p. 138, #61 p. 46, #62 p. 47, #89 p. 66, #125 p. 92, #130 p. 96, #135 pp. 101-102. "...In this year [1318/19] the entire Christ-glorifying flock was troubled by the breath of Lara[banda]lul, Khan of the Nation of the Archers. Inspired by Satan, he ordered that taxes be collected from all Christians because of their faith in Christ, and he ordered that a blue mark/badge be sewn on the shoulders of Believers. Beyond this, they took taxes from clerics, without the Khan’s order. Then the thrice-blessed, holy patriarch Za[k]aria went after the Khan as far as Babylon (and remained) one whole year. He received from him a varli̱[a]l[fe] freeing the clerics and priests from taxation, but they collected from the laymen and youths...And in the spring of this year they collected the tax, but in autumn the Khan died. Then there came Ailału, Sint'amur and Hasant'amur with 1,300 men, and collected the tax a second time, but without limit, and no one resisted them. The monks who were free, whom they captured, they tortured with unbelievable torments and collected limitless fines. The blessed congregation [of Varaga] fell into their hands. They arrived, suddenly, secretly, at night. Everyone fled, but those they seized they tortured so, that we are unable to relate it. Others who had fled did not dare return to the monastery for [the Mongols] kept coming, day and night troubling us. Horrified by them, in fear and trembling we spent morning and evening on the blessed mountain, in caves, and crevices of rock. But they came every day and opened all the church doors and small rooms and looted whatever they found... And we bore many other sorrows, harassments and trials from all sides, in summer and winter a fugitive, and sleeping out in the open on the blessed mountain. For a long time we bore these and other troubles, and for the love of the holy Cross, taking refuge in It, we did not leave this holy congregation. [People from] the city and country fled hither and thither, a silent meeting-place remained; but we stayed firmly in place out of love for the holy Cross" (14CC #178 p. 138).
Needless to say, such unenlightened policies did indeed create a new class of domestic enemies at a time when the Il-Khanid state could hardly afford it.

Spuler writes: "On embracing Islam [the Mongols] became of one faith with the numerous Turks of Iran, who had long been solidly Muslim; and when the two peoples thus ceased to be kept apart by religion, they fused into a new amalgam, whose everyday tongue was Turkish. At the beginning of the 14th century, the various Turkish tribes which, together with later arrivals, have formed the backbone of the present Turkish-speaking element in the population of Persia, began to take definite shape. The province of Azerbaijan, which as the center of Il-Khanid power became the main focus of Turco-Mongol colonization, has remained solidly Turkish-speaking ever since, the Mongol speech having soon given way to the Turkish" (Spuler, p. 36).
Among the ephemeral changes instituted during Ghazan's reign was fiscal reform. This was undertaken on the prudent advice of Ghazan's chief vizier, the historian Rashid al-Dīn, a Jewish convert to Islam. Rashid attempted to check some of the most egregious abuses of the nomadic fiscal system, characterized by the repeated collection under force of imprecisely stipulated taxes; the billeting of hordes of official "emissaries" or elchis on local populations; and the wanton destruction of crop lands. But the early 14th century was already late for correcting abuses now over a century old, especially since the reforming spirit did not find favorable reception among Mongol nomad chieftains. Moreover, one should bear in mind that neither of the changes occurring in Ghazan's time—Islamization as well as the beginning and end of fiscal reform—took place to the exclusion of those other features of Mongol nomadism outlined above. Far from it, religious persecution and economic chaos operated in addition to the other abuses. Thus, for example, in 1319 during the reign of Khuda-Banda's young son Abū Sa'id (then a boy of 15), a Mongol chieftain named Qurumshī rebelled in the Caucasus. The Gelarkunik’ area of Armenia and parts of southern Georgia were ravaged. The very next year another Mongol rebellion flared up, caused by a disgruntled basqaq or tax-collector. Northern Armenia and eastern Georgia were devastated. Il-Khanid foreign policy too was on a disaster course, with the state’s powerful neighbors, Mongols (Chaghatais, Golden Horde) and Egyptians arming for war. Meanwhile Armenians and Georgians still were expected to fight in the army to defend the Il-Khanid state.

---

1 HAP III p. 641; Colophons speak of religious persecution in Berkri (1318) 14CC #180 p. 144, Sebastia (1320) #202 p. 162, #284 p. 226; Lofī, #310 p. 249, Sebastia again #316 p. 256, and Karin (1335) #333 p. 270. Erzinjan was being harassed by Chobanids already in 1326/27 (SA p. 167). The city was besieged again in 1334 and again in 1336 (SA p. 168).

2 Spuler pp. 39-40.

3 See Ališan, Hayapatum, #353 p. 527 where prince K’urd II claims to have served militarily from 1292-1335. With the Islamization of the Mongols, references to Christian naxarars’ service in the army disappear; See KC pp. 311-17, 319-24; Mur. pp. 175-81, 183-87.
Following the death of Abū Sa‘īd in 1335, a period of nine years of internecine warfare broke out among various nomadic elements vying for power. Between 1335 and 1344 no less than 8 Khāns were enthroned, only to be deposed or murdered, shortly afterwards. But the collapse of the Il-Khāns, far from signalling freedom from oppressive rule for the Armenians, meant only that that land now became the theater of warfare for the various new contenders.\(^1\)

During the first part of the 14th century, the first set of new contenders consisted of two nomadic clans, the Jalayirids and the Chobanids. The eponymous founders of both these clans had come to northwestern Iran, the Caucasus and Asia Minor during the 13th century. As a result of devastating battles fought between these clans in Armenia in 1338, the Chobanids emerged as temporary victors. The Chobanids, under the leadership of one 잖아ن-ی چک، reunited many parts of the fragmented Hūlegūid state (including Armenia).\(^2\) However, their victory did not mean the disappearance of the rival Jalayirids. In 1340 잖아ن-ی چک waged war against Jalayirid holdings in

\(^1\) Shp pp. 413-17; 14CC #339 p. 276, #347 p. 281, #348 p. 283, #350 p. 285, #379 p. 306.

Diyārbakr. The Muş area in southwestern Armenia was ravaged. In 1343 Ḥasan-i Kūchak raided parts of western Armenia under Jalayirid control, capturing Karin/Erzerum and Sebastia/Sivas\(^1\). In 1344 with Ḥasan’s murder, real power passed to his brother Malik-Ashraf who ruled 13 years with ferocious cruelty. Not only did he battle Jalayirids, but he turned his wrath on the remnants of the once-great Armenian noble houses in Ani and Bjni in the north and northeast. These towns were ravaged in the early 1350’s\(^2\). The unwise and unpopular actions of the Chobanids estranged a sizeable portion of the nomadic aristocracy. To escape Malik-Ashraf’s persecutions, many Mongol nobles fled westward from Iran to Armenian Naxijewan and to Caucasian Albania\(^3\). Flight, however, was not the limit of their response. Mongol nobles went 14CC #378 pp. 304-305.

\(^1\) HAP IV p.17; Erzijan was besieged and burned in 1339/40--1341/42 (SA p. 168); 14CC Erzijan #400 p. 325, Sebastia #414 p. 334, Bayberd #433 p. 346, Vayoc’ Jor #448 p. 369, Divrigi #449 p. 369.

\(^2\) HAP IV p. 18; VT pp. 169-70; According to SA p. 169 in 1348/49 there was famine; scribes from Alt’amar report harassments in the early 1350’s: 14CC #485 p. 405, #489 p. 408, at Erzijan #493 p. 411; Alt’amar: #496 p. 414.

\(^3\) HAP IV p. 18.
north to Khan Janī-Beg of the Golden Horde, beseeching him to invade Azarbāijān to "liberate" them. Thus in 1357 the Caucasus once more was overrun by invasion from the north. Janī-Beg put an end to the Chobanids that year, set up a new governor, and departed.

Now the Jalayirids became the new contenders for the Il-Khān legacy. In 1358 Jalayirids fought the soldiers of Janī-Beg in Tabrīz, Naxijewan and Qarabāgh, expelling them and seizing much of the Chobanids' holdings in Armenia and Iran. However the Jalayirid state was nothing but an ever-shifting network of uneasy alliances among nomadic bands. Centrifugal pressures split it into numerous parts around 1374, after which nomadic tribes of Mongols, Turkmens and Kurds warred against one another and against the sedentary Armenian population.

From the standpoint of destructiveness, two Turkmen groups played a major role in Armenia in the late 14th century. One was the Qara Qoyunlu ("Black Sheep") Turkmens who had established themselves in the central and southern Armenian districts in the late 13th century. Throughout the 1 HAP IV pp. 19-20; Spuler pp. 40-41, 54-55; SA p. 169; 14CC #519 p. 433.

2 HAP IV p. 20.

3 HAP IV p. 21; SA p. 170.
14th century they raided districts in southern Armenia and by the mid-1380's had extended their rule over parts of central Armenia. The other nomadic group was the Ottomans. The latter were a part of the Ghuzz tribesmen who had first come into Asia Minor in the 11th century, but greatly increased with new arrivals during the 13th century. By the beginning of the 14th century, the Ottoman entity had emerged as the strongest of the many small states to arise on the ruins of the Sultanate of Rûm. Throughout the 14th century the Ottomans continued to expand at the expense of other Turkmen principalities. Toward the end of the century, they controlled areas of western Armenia, such as Sebastia/Si̇vās, Erz̄ı̄jan, and Melitene/Malatya.

The confused situation thus created in the Caucasus and in Asia Minor did not go unnoticed by Khān Tokhtamysh of the Golden Horde. In 1385, with an army of 50,000, he invaded Ḍezarbājān via Darband and Shīrvān. After taking Tabrīz, his marauding army divided into sections, one group going via Mārand to Naxijewan and Siwnik', which latter district was plundered from south to north. Khān Tokhtamysh's divided army reunited in Qarabāgh and then returned north via Shîrvân. With them went 200,000 slaves including tens of thousands of Armenians from the districts of Parskahayk', Siwnik', and Arc'ax'.

1 HAP IV p. 21; 1368 harassment of Christians in Muš 14CC #590 p. 483; 1370 Ekeleac' district, #601 p. 491; Ait 'amar #607 p. 495; Kamax #681 p. 546.

2 HAP IV pp. 30-31; Mokk' 14CC #643 p. 520; Tarōn #652 p. 525.

From 1220, when the Mongols first appeared in the Caucasus, to 1385 when Tokhtamysh invaded, a period of 165 years had elapsed. During this time different parts of Armenia had experienced no less than 12 foreign invasions, and the severity of Mongol rule had triggered three Armeno-Georgian rebellions. Mongol centrifugation had resulted in two major uprisings of Mongol nomads resident in the Caucasus itself. Moreover, with the collapse of the Il-Khan state in the 1330's, a condition of "internal war" had existed in most parts of historical Armenia, as mutually antagonistic bands (and armies) of Mongol, Turkmen and Kurdish nomads fought one another and the sedentary native population. Religious persecution and economic chaos had long since become the norm. Armenia now lay supine. However, a new storm was about to break.

In 1386-87, 1394-96 and 1399-1403 Armenia was subjected to what were perhaps the most brutal invasions yet. These were led or directed by the lame warlord Tīmūr (Tamerlane) and constituted the last invasions of Armenia from Central Asia. In his Mongols in History, J.J. Saunders wrote of Tīmūr:

1 HAP IV pp. 22-23; SA p. 171; 14CC #700 pp. 559-60; TK pp. 12, 98.

...His career was a singularly barren one. The great Chingiz at least created an empire that imposed order and peace and a rudimentary civilization on Asia for over a century: Timur's kingdom vanished with his life, and his imperialism was imbued with no purpose other than the agglomeration of sheer power built on the corpses of millions. Till the advent of Hitler, Tīmūr stood forth in history as the supreme example of soulless and unproductive militarism, n.1.

During the first Tīmūrid invasion of 1386-87, Maxijewan was captured and the fortress of Ernjak was besieged (though it did not surrender until 1401). The towns and fortresses of Karbi, Bjni, Gafni, Surmari and Koab fell, and the districts of Ayrarat and Lesser Siwnik' were devastated2. Tiflis was taken and sacked, and Tīmūr had the opportunity to demonstrate his non-discriminatory policy vis-à-vis killing Muslims. Wherever he went, Christian and Muslim resistance received equal treatment:

1 J.J. Saunders, op.cit., p. 59.

2 The Continuator of Samuel of Ani has the following entry under 1386/87: "The Turks took the fortress of Orotan and the great vardapet Kaxik went as a fugitive to Car... In the same year T'oxtamiš, Khan of Crimea dispatched troops to Persia. They came and entered Tabriz... they destroyed and captured more than 20 x 10,000 men and women, then crossed via Maxijewan and Siwnik', and went to their own land. In the same year Lankt'amur either the resisters were exterminated, or entire populations were led off into Central Asia to live and die in slavery. After wintering in Mughan Azarbajjan, Timur's generals crossed into the Kajberunik' and Capaljur districts of southern and southwestern Armenia, where they fought unsuccessfully against the Qara Qoyunlu Turkmens. Some Timurid detachments reached as far north came to Tabriz and Naxijewan and thence in one day captured as far as Karbi and Bjni, to Gafni, Surmari and Kolb. Thence he went to Georgia and made holy war (iaza arar) against the city of Tiflis. Capturing the king Bagrat, he made him convert to Islam (ta’kac ‘ovc’), then he went and wintered in Mughan. At the onset of the next year, on the day of Easter, he came to Siwnik' and spread all about. He went after the Turkmens as far as the Amida river, turned back on the city of Van, and besieged it for 25 days. He captured it on a Thursday...and threw everyone down from the fortress: 7,000 men. Then he went to the land of Samarkand. After six years, once again Timur came forth, descending into Baghdad where he killed many people and built six minarets out of heads. He went to Syrian Mesopotamia and killed many people there. Now the son of sultan Ahmad was in the fortress of Ernjak. The Georgians came and took it. When Timur heard this he was angered and came forth in great rage. He went to Georgia causing much ruin and harm with sword, fire, and captive-taking. He demolished the grandest churches in Tiflis and thence descended to Syria. He approached Jerusalem but did not enter. Then he turned back with much booty and went to T’axt. The next year he went to Rum and took Kamax and many other places. In Sebastia he buried more than 2,000 people alive, then returned to his place. The next year he returned to Rum and captured khan Yeltrum who had countless cavalry and troops. He dispersed and captured all” (SA pp. 171-72). 14CC #709 pp. 567-68; Armenian Neo-martyrs, Vanak bishop of Bjni (d. 1387/88) p. 136; HAP IV pp. 24-25.

1 HAP IV p. 26; "The commencement of copying this gospel occurred in the year 1387/66 (A.E. 836) in a bitter time when many places were devastated because of our sins. A wicked Mahmetakan tyrant named Lank-T’amur arose in the East with countless troops and enveloped Persia as far as the Rum country. Coming to Armenia he demolished and enslaved everything and pitilessly put to the sword all..."
as Karin/Erzerum, looting, pillaging, and taking slaves as they went¹. In 1387 Timūr besieged the Kurdish emir Ezdin at Van. When he took the citadel after 26 days' besiegement, the women and children were enslaved, while some 7,000 males of all faiths were killed by being hurled from the walls². After Timūr left Asia Minor in 1387, severe famine ensued, since due to the disruptions he had caused, crops were not planted, and now there was nothing to harvest³. Cannibalism was reported in some areas⁴.

all the Armenians and Tačiks whom he found. Oh, who can relate all his evil and the damage he occasioned in various places. Now...this was finished in the Kajberunik’ country at the retreat called Manuk Surb Nāsan, consecrated by the apostle Thaddeus, and at the foot of [the church of] Georg the General, during the patriarchate of Armenians of lord Zak’aria, when the country was controlled by Lara-Iwsiwf (Qara Yusuf), a wicked, bitter, loathsome wrecker of the land...May God not cause us to witness again what we have seen" (14CC #710 p. 569).

¹ 14CC #711 p. 570.
³ HAP IV p. 27.
⁴ TM p. 32.
The country hardly had recovered from this when, in 1394, Timur returned. Entering western Armenia from northern Mesopotamia, he took Erzincan, parts of Basen district and Awnik fortress; Kars, Surmari Kolb, Bagaran and Ayrarat were ravaged; and the Qara Qoyunlu Turkmen areas, centered at Arsoe, north of Lake Van, were attacked. At this point Timur turned upon Khan Tokhtamysh of the Golden Horde who had been raiding Shirvan. The Timurids defeated Tokhtamysh and sacked his principal cities, Astrakhan and Sarai.

Timur appointed Miran, his half-mad son, as governor of Iran, Iraq, Armenia and other parts of the Caucasus. In 1396 Miran continued operations against Ernjak in the south and expanded warfare against the Kurdish emir of Bitlis. In 1397 southern Vaspurakan was ravaged and Ani in the north fell. Strangely, all powers of resistance had not been completely broken by the Timurids. In 1399 king Georgi VII of Georgia attacked the Timurid besiegers of Ernjak fortress, temporarily freeing those inside from the 13 year siege.

1 HAP IV p. 28; 14CC #756 p. 607, #762 p. 611, #765 p. 613, #772 p. 618.
2 Spuler p. 67.
3 HAP IV p. 29.
4 14CC #778 p. 621.
5 HAP IV p. 29 n. 43; Allen p. 124; 14CC #784 p. 629.
But when Tīmūr learned about the retaking of Ernāk, he left Samarkand and headed for the Caucasus. In revenge he attacked northeastern Armenia and southern Georgia, killing, destroying, and taking slaves. More than 60,000 Caucasians were led into slavery this time (in 1400), and many districts of northern Armenia were depopulated. Subsequently, Tīmūr headed for western Armenia where he took Sebastia/Sīvās and Melitene/Malatya from his arch-enemies, the Ottomans. After conquering Aleppo, Damascus, Mardin, and Baghdad, Tīmūr decisively beat and captured the Ottoman sultan, Bāyazīd I in 1402. The next year Georgia was invaded again and its king finally submitted to Tīmūr. During 1403-1404 Tīmūr wintered in Qarabāgh before returning to Saraqand. He died there in 1405 at the age of 70, having left a trail of blood and pyramids of decapitated heads across Asia and the Middle East.

1 HAP IV p. 30.
2 HAP IV p. 31.
3 HAP IV pp. 31-32.
Although the focus of this chapter has been on the invasions of the 13-14th centuries, the survey commenced with the Saljuq invasions of the 11th century and with the remark that they were a sort of "dress rehearsal" for the later invasions. In what ways were the invasions qualitatively similar and dissimilar vis-a-vis treatment of the Armenians? All of the invasions from the 11th through to the 14th centuries contained a Turkmen element which at times was "controllable" by the leaders of the invasions, but at times uncontrollable. This element worked to the detriment of settled societies (such as Armenia's) and to later Turco-Mongol governments as well.

The Saljuq invasions and conquest of Armenia occurred over a period of 50 years (ca. 1020-70). The initial Mongol invasions and conquest occurred over a shorter period, 1236-60. Both the Saljuq invasions and the 13th century Mongol invasions were facilitated by a weakened Armenia. In the 11th century, Armenia had been weakened by the policies of Byzantium. In the 13th century, the five year rule of Jalāl al-Dīn destroyed the Caucasian potential for resisting the Mongols. The Turco-Mongol invasions of the 14th century also encountered an Armenia weakened and exhausted—this time by the experience of Mongol domination.
Consequences of the Mongol domination regarding the Armenian lords are described in the following chapter. After the Saljuq invasions, those Armenian lords remaining in their patrimonies made accommodation with the new overlords and a process of "Armenization" or "naxararization" of the Saljuq nobility took place. This was possible primarily because from the late 11th until the 13th century no major comparable invasions or disruptions occurred. Furthermore, as was noted, the Saljuq domination was not uniform across the Armenian highlands. After merely forty years, the Saljuq empire was in pieces. Already in the early 12th century, thanks to Georgia, an Armenian center existed in the northeastern part of the highlands. By the 13th century many districts of historical northeastern, central and even southern Armenia were under Armenian political control again. Such was not the case from ca. 1221 to 1403 when the Armenian highlands were subjected to frequent invasions, having as it were, no time to recover from one before the next was in progress.

The Mongol domination lasted longer than the Saljuqid and incorporated Armenia into an empire more firmly. For almost 100 years (1240-1330) Armenia experienced Mongol rule and misrule. Nor was there a protector for Armenia. If in the 11-12th centuries Georgia was the deliverer and source of strength against Islam, in the 13th century the Armenians looked to the "Christian" Mongols—to the invaders themselves—for protection. With the Islamization of the Mongols, any hope for protection, or even for equal, just treatment disappeared.

Finally, unlike the Iranizing Saljuqs of Asia Minor who created an era of economic prosperity in the 12th-early 13th centuries, the Mongols commenced their domination by looting many of the Armenian cities. Subsequently they literally taxed the life out of the various societies under their control—seemingly unaware of the ultimate consequences for themselves, as well as for the subjugated population.
Triumph of the Turkmens

The barely controllable, plunder-hungry Turkmen element which formed the mainstay of the armies of the Saljuq conquerors of the 11th century also participated in all subsequent Turco-Mongol invasions. It had no interest in good government or the maintenance of order. On the contrary, the nomadic Turkmens solely were concerned with the aggrandizement of portable wealth. The lives of despoiled populations were of no value to them, unless such populations could be sold into slavery. Yet, as was pointed out earlier, all Saljuqs and all Mongols did not share these aims. Consequently, centralizing forces within both the Saljuq and Mongol governments were obliged to support a very delicate balance. On the one hand, the warlike Turkmens were the best, most determined fighters and so were necessary for victorious expeditions. On the other hand, the Turkmens' impulse to destroy all and move on had to be fought--sometimes literally--in order for the more sedentary elements to impose taxation on the conquered peoples, and exploit them in a more systematic fashion. But eventually the Turkmens were victorious, destroying both organized Turkish and Mongol states. Destructive nomadism of the Turkmen type (essentially a type of economic parasitism) also was practised by some Kurdish and Arab groups operating in southern and southwestern Armenia.
The initial Mongol expedition of 1220/21 was in the Caucasus primarily for reconnaissance. Apart from reporting the pillaging of herds and the sack of some few cities, the Caucasian sources do not dwell on unbridled Turkmen activity at that time. This reconnaissance army was disciplined and obedient to its commanders.

The nature of Turkmen activity becomes clearer with the destructive sojourn of Jalāl al-Dīn on the Armenian highlands (1225-ca. 1230). During these five bloody years, Jalāl held the loyalty of the Turkmens in his company by giving them full rein, and directing them especially against Christians. While the actual devotion to Islam of Jalāl or of his rude hordes is questionable, his technique of directing rampages against Christians effectively satisfied the army's lust for plunder and simultaneously provided a religious justification for its actions. Jalāl's career was that of a Turkmen brigand and he died the death of an unsuccessful brigand chief. He was abandoned by the army when he was unable to provide it with more loot. With his murder, as we have seen, Turkmen in small bands continued harassing sedentary populations and caravans all over the Middle East.

When the Mongols returned in 1236, the Turkmen element in their midst was satiated somewhat by the sack of resisting cities. However, even in this early period of Mongol rule, when the central government was at its strongest, there is evidence of irregularities. For example, the Armenian city of Surb Mari (Surmalu) was sacked by the regular Mongol army, but then ravished a second time by a certain noble named Lara Bahatur. Similarly, during the taking of Western Armenia, though it was Mongol policy to spare surrendering cities, some were sacked nonetheless, because chieftains could not control their men, or (perhaps better) because so many chieftains themselves were inclined to plunder. The centrifugal nomadic element was unaccustomed to and uninterested in sedentary government and its forms. The Turco-Mongol nomads were unhappy at the fixed rates of taxation imposed on subject populations. Indeed, their constant illegal exactions were the root cause behind each Caucasian rebellion. Kor, clearly, did this element fancy the exalted stations given to some of the Caucasian nobles. For example, the death of Awag's influential patron, the Mongol general Chormaghun in 1242/43 led to an increase in disorders of all sorts. Turkmens immediately plotted (unsuccessfully) to murder Awag. When the same

1 KG p. 260.

2 KG pp. 263-64; GA pp. 321, 323.

3 KG p. 264.
elements in the army learned about plans for a Caucasian rebellion (1249/50):

...suddenly all the nobility of the Tatar army held a council, armed, and universally wanted to ravage the lands of Armenia and Georgia, [lands] obedient to them, because the Georgian king sought to rebel with all the princes...[the Mongols] wanted generally to destroy everyone. 1.

Awag's patron and friend Chaghatai prevented this, and in a dramatic appeal to the furious Mongols presented the views of the central government, barely preventing a massacre of the captured naxarars:

...One of the senior leaders, general of the entire army named Chaghatai, a friend of Awag, came amidst the armed troops and said to them: 'We have no order from the Khan to kill those who are obedient to us, stand in service to us, and pay taxes to the Khan. And the reality of their rebellion is not certain. But if we destroy them without cause, you will be responsible to the Khan.' 2.

Though the naxarars were not executed, the Turkmens, nonetheless, were allowed to vent their rage on the Caucasian...
population

Centrifugal elements within the Mongol army of occupation were not the only ones facing Armenians and Georgians. According to Bar Hebraeus and the History of K'art'li, in the 1230's and 1240's, remnants of Jalāl al-Dīn's nomadic Khwārazmian army entered Georgia and harassed the settled population. Khwārazmian mercenaries also operated in the Mayṣafārikin area in southwestern Armenia during the 1240's. In 1255, Mongol rebels despoiled

1 KG pp. 320-21: "[The Mongols] attacked Georgia, falling upon many districts of the rebels and non-rebels. They cut down many people and took even more captive; a countless multitude of men, women and children they drowned in the river. And this took place in 1249/50 (698 A.E.).”
VA p. 148: "...Countless numbers were killed and enslaved, villages and fields [were destroyed], and they disgraced women in Armenia, but more so in Georgia”.

3 BH p. 403.
villages around Melitene/Malatya\(^1\), and still were active in the same area at the close of the decade\(^2\). Furthermore, the arrival in Hülegü's realm of some seven of Chingiz-Khān's unruly grandchildren from the North, and their partial settlement in the Caucasus (mid-1250's) introduced another centrifugal force given over to pillaging. In the late 1250's the Caucasus was ravaged by one of these arrivals, Xul\(^3\). In 1268 another of the émigrés, Tegüder, rebelled from the Il-Khāns, causing chaos and destruction in Armenia and Georgia\(^4\).

Because of anti-Islamic feeling among the Mongols at the time of the invasion, the shamanist Turkmens' rage often was channeled against Muslims—much to the delight of beleaguered Christians. However, Mongol religious policy was quite complex, and underwent numerous shifts. For example, at the time of the census conducted by Arghun and Buqa (1243), Kirakos said that Buqa "...had assembled brigands from among the Persians and Tačika, who mercilessly performed deeds of cruelty and were especially inimical toward the Christians. Yet in 1258, during the siege of Baghdad, the Mongols encouraged the Christians in their army brutally to exterminate the city's Muslim population. But in retaliation for the Caucasian rebellion of 1259-61, Mongols destroyed churches and the Georgian kat'Qlikosate itself, and the emir Arghun (himself a Muslim) had the Christian prince Hasan Jalal tortured to death for failure to apostasize. Clearly, Mongols adroitly used the Christians in Muslim areas and the Muslims in Christian Caucasia for espionage and maintenance of terror.

\(^{1}\) BH p. 420.

\(^{3}\) GA pp. 327, 329.

With the increasing Islamization of the Mongols, their policy changed. Once again, as had happened during the invasions of the Saljuqs and the Khwarazmians, fanatical Islam was wed to the nomads' lust for booty. From toward the end of the 13th century to beyond the end of the 14th century, anti-Christian persecutions prevailed almost uninterruptedly. What earlier had been punishment meted out to an occasionally recalcitrant naxarar became the generalized fate of all Christians refusing to convert. Nomads of all kinds of backgrounds, circulating in different parts of the Armenian highlands, attacked churches, monasteries, wealthy and poor Christians. Already in the late 1270's Turkmens killed Sargis, the influential bishop of Erzinjan. In 1290, the anti-Christian lord of Mayyafarikin had the Armenian lord of Muš assassinated and then persecuted the monks of Tarōn. In 1290/91 a peripatetic Armenian priest, Grigor, was killed at Zarberd, and 45 Armenian mecatus in the city were arrested. It is interesting that this episode is recounted both in Bar Hebraeus and in an Armenian martyrology. In the Armenian account, the Mongol governor barely restrained a Muslim mob from killing the 45 merchants. This scene is reminiscent of Kirakos' account of Chaghatai's rescue of the arrested naxarars (1249/50). It is one of the last examples of such restraint to be found in the sources:

---

1 KG p. 313: "...zi žoloveal es iwra arikva i parsic' sw i tačkac' ork anynaq gorcein xoroc xakut'ean sw i šnamik' sin afawel k'ristoneic'".

2 KG pp. 390-91.

...But a certain chief named T'at'laray, of the Nation of the Archers, got up, mounted a horse, [came] with his troops, snatched the bound [prisoners] away from them and set them free in peace. Then he threatened [the would-be killers] saying: 'Were you to slay such citizens, what answer should I give to the world-conquering Khan by whom I was sent to guard this city?'

1 SA p. 162. Samuel's continuator places the murder in 1272, though the Annals of Bishop Step'annos (MC vol. i p. 44) puts it in 1276. See above ch. two pp. 120-21 n. 1.

2 BH p. 484.

3 BH pp. 483-84.

4 ANM p. 115.
In the coming decades, no "answer" would have been necessary, as anti-Christian persecution became policy. Such persecutions, executions, confiscations, and destructions of churches were reported from all parts of historical Armenia. Anti-Christian persecution was launched formally with the plundering and killing expeditions of the first decade of the 14th century, surviving colophons speak of persecutions and confiscations at Ałt'amar (14CC p. 41), and of Turkmen attacks on Tayk' Tao (KC pp. 310-12; Mur. pp. 175-77). During the second decade there were destructions of monasteries in parts of northeastern Armenia (14CC p. 66), and at Karin (14CC p. 102, also the martyrdom of bishop Grigor Karnec' i d. 1321/22 ANM pp. 121-27), persecutions in southern Armenia at Ałt'amar (14CC p.114), Varaga (14CC pp. 136-37), Berkri (14CC p. 144), Sebastia (14CC p. 163). The third decade brought a slight relaxation of the terror, but soon it escalated again (VT p. 164). In the fourth decade, persecution was reported from Iranian Tabriz (14CC p. 283), Lori in northern Armenia (14CC p.249), Ałt'amar (14CC p. 259), Goit'n (14CC p. 281), and Erz'jan. The last city was attacked by a coalition of Mongols, Turkmen and Kurds (14CC p. 305). In the fifth decade persecutions, brigandage, and massacres continued at Erz'jan (14CC p. 325), Tayk' (14CC p. 327), Bayburt and Tevrike (14CC p. 369), C'ana (14CC p. 379) and between 1350 and 1360 occurred at Ałt'amar (14CC pp. 405, 414), Erz'jan (14CC p. 411), and Bjini (VT pp. 169-70). In the seventh decade there were persecutions, expulsions, massacres and destructions of churches in Hayoc' Jor near Julamerik (14CC p. 458) and Muñ (14CC p. 483). Reference to persecutions in the above cities should not be taken to mean that persecutions occurred solely there and solely at that date. Anti-Christian terror was a permanent feature of the 14th century and it was general throughout the Armenian highlands, north, south, east, and west, though its scale and intensity did vary greatly.
itions of Nauruz (1295/96) during the reign of Ghazan-Khān. Whether or not Ghazan at first knew about Nauruz' activities is disputed from source to source. Granted, Nauruz eventually was hunted down and executed at Ghazan’s command, with Christian Caucasians gleefully participating. But by then, the Turkmens were no longer controllable.

Not surprisingly, the "hellish and bitter" 14th century did not produce literary historians such as Kirakos, Vardan, or Step’annos. The disorganized history of T’ovma Mecop’ec’i (d. ca. 1446) does speak of the last three decades of the 14th century, but for the first seven decades, only the humble authors of chronicles and colophons, many of them anonymous, detail the persecutions, plunderings of churches and famines. They do not speak of land disputes among naxarars—many of whom already had quit the country, had apostasized, or been killed.

In the 1320's, Grigor, bishop of Karin/Erzerum was killed after refusing to convert. In 1334 Christians were obliged to wear special blue badges as a visible indicator of their subordinate status, just as economically their subordinate status was made formal years before (1301/2) by the inception of the kharaj tax, an annual tax on Christians\(^1\). The requirement of the blue badge, kerchief, or hat, to set the Christians apart from Muslims was observed by the Bavarian captive, Johann Schiltberger around 1400, and so was a feature of the entire 14th century\(^2\).

1 SA p. 167 dates this in 1321/22, while ANM p. 123 has 1326/27.
2 SA p. 165.

With the breakdown of the Il-Khanid government in the 1330's, various Turkmen, Mongol, and Kurdish bands became completely unchecked. For example, in 1343, the Qara Qoyunlu (Black Sheep) Turkmen (who had established bases in Bagrewand and Kajberunik' in the late 13th century) were ceaselessly raiding around Ilat'\(^3\). The Spanish Muslim traveller Ibn Battuta in 1333 noted that Karin/Erzerum was "mostly in ruins as a consequence of a factional feud which broke out between two groups of Turkmens there"\(^4\). During the 1330's and 1340's, the cities of Erzumjan, Sebastia/Sivas, and Karin/Erzerum were under almost constant seige by rival nomadic groups\(^5\).

---

1 SA p. 165.
2 JS p. 74.
3 14CC p. 334.
4 Battūta p. 437.
5 SA pp. 167-69.
Hat' was captured by Turkmens in 1359\(^1\). Furthermore, in the 1380's, Tāmūr's detachments frequently battled with Qara Qoyunlu and Kurdish groups. In the Capaljur and Muš areas and near Karin/Erzerum, the Turkmens successfully resisted Tāmūr's advance\(^2\). In 1382 Turkmen groups were fighting in the plain of Artas\(^3\). During his second invasion (1395) Tāmūr raided Turkmen areas centered at Arçes on Lake Van's northern shore\(^4\).

Concomitant with the chaos occasioned by warring nomads went persecution of Christians—especially of the clerical nobility. In 1387/88, Step'annos, archbishop of Sebastia/Sīvās was executed for failure to convert. His monastery of St. Nēn was converted into a dervish sanctuary, and other churches there were demolished\(^5\). In 1393/94, kat'olikos Zak'aria of Ait'amr and the kat'olikos of Sis, T'ēodoros both were executed\(^6\). Between

---

\(^1\) SA p. 169.
\(^2\) TM p. 21.
\(^3\) SA p. 170.
\(^4\) TM pp. 46-47.
\(^5\) ANM pp. 144-45.
\(^6\) SA p. 172.
1403 and 1406, according to the Spanish ambassador Clavijo, Timur demolished the churches of Erznnjan and Bekaristan.

The triumph of the Turkmens drained Armenia in numerous ways. H. Manandyan and L. Babayan have observed the collapse of Armenia's economy, pointing out the incompatibility of the nomadic economic system with the agricultural and mercantile economy of Armenia. The Mongols expropriated for their own use vast tracts of land in Armenia, taking certain choice farming areas for summer and winter pasturage for their herds. The slopes of the Aragac mountains, and the areas of Vayoc' Jor, parts of the plain of Ayrarat, and areas around Karin/Erzerum, Van, Berkri, and Baleš/Bitlis became summer yavlas, while Vaspurakan, the Ayrarat plains and the Xarberd region were used for wintering places. These areas formerly had been under intensive agricultural development, but increasingly in the late 13th and in the 14th century they became semi-desert. Parts of southern

1 Clav. pp. 130, 138.

2 H.A. Manandyan, Trade, chp. VI pp. 201-202, chp. VI passim; L.H. Babayan, Aknarkner mijnadaryan hayastani patmut iwnic' [Episodes from the History of Medieval Armenia], "Koçyorakan feodalakan tntesajevi tirapetut'van betevank mere netakyac" koçovurdneri tntesakan kvank i vra [Consequences of the Domination of the Nomadic Feudal Economic System on the Economic Life of Sedentary Peoples] [Episodes] pp. 77-119.

3 Episodes p. 83.

4 HAP p. 657.
and western Armenia were used almost solely for animal husbandry. The Mongols and Turkmen nomads used the area between Erzı̈njan, Bayberd, and Sebastia/Sı̈vās, and areas around Van and in Diyarbakır for these purposes, also. Not only was good farmland allowed to desiccate, but with the mass enslavings and deportations of whole villages, there were even fewer farmers; and with the mass theft of livestock, remaining farmers often were deprived of their only source of power for pulling the plow.

A part of the Caucasian land-owning class also was deprived of land and driven to bankruptcy by the Mongols' excessive tax demands. Already by the time of the princes' rebellion of 1259-61, the sources speak of the impoverishment of some of the princes:

"...With [the rebel king David] went many other great princes of districts who were harassed and harried, bankrupt, and who had mortgaged cities and districts, but were still unable to satiate the evil, leech-like appetite [of the Mongols]."

---

1 HAP p. 658.

2 KG p. 389: "...end nma ew ayl mecamec ĭāxank' gawarač' nešcalk' ew tatapealk', caxcalk' sw graw edealk' zk'āšak' a ew zgawara, ew ǭ č karac ealk' yagec uc anel zanyage est nmanut 'san čar tšrket'w."
At the same time that certain large landholders were selling their estates, a few Mongol favorites such as Sahmadin, Umek, Snorhawor and Sadun Arcruni were purchasing them and became landholders after the example of the Mongol aristocrats, owning huge properties in different states. However, the wealth of these few lords, accumulated from trading and land speculation, cannot serve as an index of the country's prosperity.

The decline of Armenia's cities in this period was caused by Turkmen ravages, excessive taxation, and by the transferal of the international trade routes. Rashid al-Din speaking about the disasters situation at the beginning of the 14th century, wrote that five of every ten houses were deserted, and that numerous cities on both sides of the Euphrates had been abandoned. Hamd Allah Mustawfi Qazvini noted the decline of cities and towns in Caucasia across the Armenian highlands in his day (1340). Speaking of Georgia and Abkazia, he stated that "revenues in time of their native kings amounted to near 5,000,000 dinars of the present currency; but in our times the government only obtains 1,202,000 dinars." About Rum, which embraced western Armenia, he said: "Its revenues at the present day amount to 3,300,000

---

1 HAP p. 657.
2 Rashid, III pp. 308-309; Yov. YiS. p. 992.
3 Q p. 94.
dinars as set down in the registers; but during the time of the Saljuqs they were in excess of 15,000,000 dinars of the present currency". The walls of Sebastia/Sivas were in ruins; Awnik was in ruins; Bayburt "was a large town; it is now but a small one"; Muş "in former times a large city, but now a ruin"; Berkri "a small town, that was a large place formerly"; "Van is a fortress and Vastan (Ostan) was a large town formerly, but now only of medium size". Xlat' "is the capital of this province [Greater Armenia] and its revenues in former days amounted to near 2,000,000 dinars of the present currency; but now the total sum paid is only 390,000 dinars". Until the Saljuq invasions, Siwnik' had some

1 Q. p. 95.
2 ibid.
3 Q. p. 96.
4 ibid.
5 Q. p. 105.
6 Q. p. 100.
8 Q. p. 100.
1,000 villages, while at the end of the 13th century, the figure had declined by 331 to 677 villages. According to Samuel of Ani and Matthew of Edessa, the former Arcrunid kingdom in Vaspurakan had over 4,000 villages, but 13th and 14th century authors speak of that area with distress, as if describing a desert. Furthermore, in the 1350's the trade routes shifted away from the northern cities of Ani and Kars, to southern cities of Xlat', Mayyafarikin/Np’rkert, and Arisc, helping to impoverish northeastern Armenia. Not surprisingly, it is precisely from the mid-14th century that the great nazarar families of northeastern Armenia quickly fade from the sources, literary and inscriptional. Influential Zak'arids, Vaçuteans and Prošeans (known as such, and not by a different surname) are unknown after 1360, and noteworthy Orbéleans and Dop'eans are mentioned last at the end of the 14th century.

An important aspect of the Turkmens' triumph concerns the settlement of Turco-Mongol populations across the Armenian highlands. Regrettably, the sources do not contain much information on this question. The sources mention Mongols established in the area between Erzi'jan

1 HAP p. 661.

3 HAP pp. 642-44. R. Hewsen's articles ("The Meliks" in REA) have demonstrated the probable survival of "noble" status within melik families descended from the nazarars Bayburt and Sebastia/Sivas; Qara-Qoyunlu Turkmen in the Lake Van basin; Aq-Qoyunlu Turkmen in the Amida-Diyarbakr area\(^1\). Presumably some of those areas of southern and western Armenia which the nomads used for their yaylas eventually were transformed into sedentary communities. In the 1403-1406 period, Clavijo encountered but two yaylas, one near Bekariş and the other in Ernjak, though clearly there must have been more\(^2\). Johan Schiltberger speaks of Turkmens in the Samsun area, renting pasturage\(^3\). With time, more and more Turkmens began settling in or near cities. Clavijo observed that both Erzijan and Ani—two traditionally Armenian cities—had Turkmen governors, and that Bekariş had an Armenian and a Turkish suburb\(^4\).

\(^1\) Episodes p. 86.

\(^2\) Clav. pp. 138, 148.

\(^3\) JS p. 14.

\(^4\) Clav. pp. 138-39, 333.
CONCLUSION

This study has examined various aspects of Armenian history during the 13-14th centuries. Commencing with a review of the Armenian and non-Armenian sources (chapter one), the political and military history of Armenia in our period, and in the period immediately preceding it was presented in chapter two. The third and final chapter concerned Armenia's nobility, the naxars.

From 1220, when the Mongols first appeared in the Caucasus, to 1385 when Tokhtamysh invaded, a period of 165 years had elapsed. During that time different parts of Armenia had experienced no less than 12 foreign invasions, and the severity of Mongol rule had triggered three Armeno-Georgian rebellions. Mongol centrifugation had resulted in two major uprisings of Mongol nomads resident in the Caucasus itself. Moreover, with the collapse of the Il-Khānīd state in the 1330's, a condition of "internal war" had existed in most parts of historical Armenia, as mutually antagonistic bands (and armies) of Mongol, Turkmen, and Kurdish nomads fought one another and the sedentary native population. Religious persecution and economic chaos had long since become the norm. In 1386-87, 1394-96, and 1399-1403, Armenia was subjected to what were perhaps the most brutal invasions yet, led or directed by Tīmūr.
By focussing on the information regarding each of the major invasions provided in the Armenian, Georgian, and relevant non-Caucasian sources, the specific features of each have been set forth.

Each successive invasion—Saljuq (11th century, introduced as a prototypical example), Khwarazmian, Mongol and Timurid—pushed before it, brought along with it, or dragged in its wake into Asia Minor, thousands of virtually uncontrollable nomadic warriors who (when totally unchecked) devastated the cities, searching for plunder, destroyed the countryside and the complex irrigation systems, turning cultivated fields into pasturage for their sheep herds, and reduced the possibilities for internal and international trade by infesting the trade routes between cities, and attacking caravans. Following the noted Mongolist, Bertold Spuler, we have described this element as Turkmen, under which is understood not necessarily or solely a Turkic or Turcophone population, but rather that plunder-hungry element among the nomads, in contradistinction to those forces interested in the establishment of stable forms of government, and a sedentary or semi-sedentary existence. Centralizing forces within the various Turco-Mongol societies described, were obliged to support a very delicate balance. On the one hand, the warlike Turkmens were the best, most determined fighters, and so were necessary for victorious expeditions. On the other hand, the Turkmens' impulse to destroy and move on had to be fought—sometimes literally—in order for the more sedentary elements to impose taxation on the conquered peoples, and attempt to exploit them in a more systematic fashion. But eventually the Turkmens were victorious, destroying the organized Turkish and Mongol states.

As was pointed out in the final chapter, the wild, unrestrained, plunder-hungry element was present from the very first, during the Mongol invasions and of course during the domination of Armenia (beginning in 1236). In a sense, even the "centralizing elements", or let us say "representatives of the 'central government'" became "Turkmenized". The Mongols did not know the meaning of fair taxation; application of the principle of peaceful exploitation through taxation was not well understood by the rulers of the various nomadic societies, and as a result, conquered countries were squeezed dry of human and material resources. With the Islamization of the Mongols, and the ethnic fusion of Turkic and Mongol groups, all aspects of life became further "Turkmenized". The illegal, extraordinary exactions placed upon taxed communities (reported in the sources almost from the first) were thereby given a religious justification. Once again under the Mongols, as had happened during the invasions of the Saljuqs and the Khwarazmians, fanatical Islam was wed to the nomads' lust for booty. From toward the end of the 13th century to beyond the end of the 14th century, anti-Christian persecutions prevailed almost uninterruptedly. What earlier had been punishment meted out to an occasionally recalcitrant naxarar became the generalized fate of all Christians refusing to convert. Nomads of all kinds of backgrounds, circulating in different parts of the Armenian highlands, attacked churches, monasteries, wealthy and poor Christians.

During the resurgence and expansion of Georgia in the late 12th and early 13th centuries, the Georgian monarchs used three control mechanisms in dealing with the nobles: (1) manipulation of precedence among the lords and its corollary, the co-optation of allegiance; (2) circumvention of the lords, and (3) de-naxararization. By the end of the 12th century the Georgian Crown had managed temporarily to rein in the most dangerous centrifugal forces—but only for the moment. In that brief historical moment (from the last decades of the 12th century until ca. 1236) Georgian culture flourished and blossomed. Under the aegis of the Georgian Crown and the Armeno-Georgian family of Zak'arean/Mxargrceli, Armenia recovered much of its irredenta, and flourished as a united state.
The nobility of the Zak'arid revival consisted of different elements: men of ambition and military talents from newly-arisen families, who were rewarded by their Zak'arid overlords with grants of land and/or the rights of administration; mecatur merchants; the remnants of the ancient dynastic families: Mamikonids, Bagratids, Arcrunids, Orbeleans, and others, who in the changed situation of the early 13th century all became Zak'arid vassals; and the clerical nobility representing the different Armenian churches.

It must be stated that the Zak'arid revival was of such short duration that the achievement—a centralized Armenian state under Georgian overlordship—is difficult to evaluate. As we illustrated, during the Zak'arid revival and throughout the 13th century there were numerous conflicts among the naxarars (secular and clerical) over land. The lords in this period were not quarreling over more orchards and choice hunting grounds, but over the tolls for right of passage from the trade routes criss-crossing the highlands. There were other superficial similarities with Arsacid naxararism, but we stress that they were more apparent than real. The feud, an important feature of Arsacid naxararism, existed in the 13th century as well, but the obligation of blood vengeance had been replaced by an elaborate schedule of payments of "blood price" with each class of society having its monetary worth, written into a law code. The old term for the inalienable clan patrimony, the hayrenik', which in Arsacid times had meant land, in the 13th century referred to both moveable and immoveable property, hereditary or purchased, and included money and shares in business enterprises as well. The service obligation of a subordinate to his lord in this period did indeed include military service, but the vassals also paid taxes in cash. Hereditary tenure and seniority were not the main features of this society. Many of the principals of the day were appointees of the Zak'arids, rewarded for their talents. The Zak'arids established marriage ties with the most prominent of the old prestigious families of eastern Armenia. Thus, for a brief moment, it appears that a feudal "command" type of society had been generated—with the principals appointed by the Zak'arids and firmly under their control.

In this connection, it is most interesting to note certain remarks made by Adontz toward the end of his study, as he compared and contrasted his interpretation of the genesis of the naxarars with the legendary account provided by the late 8th century antiquarian, Mvosës Korenac'i:
...Our own analysis justifies [Xorenac'i's interpretation since it too has shown that the naxarar system did in fact consist first of native [i.e. dynastic] and later of foreign [i.e. Arsacid] elements. The fundamental difference lies in the fact that according to Xorenac'i, the great naxarar-doms were descended from single individuals, while in our analysis they were derived from previously independent ethnic groups.

It is evident from the examples just cited that for Xorenac'i two qualities were the bases of naxarar status: service and nobility, i.e., superiority of blood... In Xorenac'i's opinion, the aristocracy consisted of the more ancient families, primarily those presumably descended from Hayk, which were already present in Armenia at the time of the coming of the Arsacids. According to us, the aristocracy consisted of the houses which had developed through the disintegration of tribal relationships.

For Xorenac'i as for us, land tenure also provided the material basis of the naxarar system. Promotion to the rank of naxarar according to him was nothing more than a grant of lands. Nobility and naxarar status were synonymous concepts for him for the very reason that all nobles possessed lands, and lands were granted in hereditary tenure. n.l.

We maintain that for the early 13th century, both Adontz and Xorenac'i were correct. Zak'are came very close to Xorenac'i's first Arsacid king, "Vašaršak" in establishing a régime. In a sense, he generated new families through association with his own. But curiously, the tendency toward convergence—meqatuns investing in land, and the remnants of the few ancient dynastic families diversifying into trade—coupled with that strong hereditarizing principle which has never ceased to operate in Armenian society--led to a "re-seeding" of what might seem like classical Arsacid naxararism, but in fact was a structure resting on a completely different base. It is very important to underline the fact that in a country with as developed a historical consciousness as Armenia, and as ancient a literature, a certain amount of evocation of the antique past pervades many sources dating from much later times. Just as the Sasanian Persians hearkened back to their Achaemenid "forbears" and adopted certain ceremonial and/or sentimental forms to stress this identification, so too did the Bagratids and Zak'arids look to the Arsacids for symbolic identification. Thus certain similarities of terminology found in Arsacid and Zak'arid sources must be analyzed on an individual basis, before any assumptions of identity may be entertained.

1 Adontz, pp. 369-70.

It is important in this regard to note that on the eve of the Turco-Mongol invasions of the 13th century, the term naxarar already designated different types of lords, just as (in a later period) the term melik did. As Hewsen noted:

By the end of the Mongol period, the Caucasian social structure had to all intents and purposes been destroyed in Armenia; its princely houses exterminated, submerged by the egalitarianism of Islam which recognized no princely dignity, or incorporated into the surviving Caucasian social structure in Georgia. Only here and there, notably in the mountains of Karabagh and Siwnik' some vestiges of the old princely houses survived and retained some measure of local autonomy. This social disintegration is clear from the disappearance of the old Armenian princely titles, so important in the Caucasian social system, and their replacement by one new and flexible term, 'melik', the very all-purposeness of which is an indication that the fixed social framework was no longer there. It would appear then, that the title 'melik' was used simply to designate any of the few surviving members of the Armenian nobility of old who retained any kind of social position in a world which had become the world of Islam; whether one had been a naxarar (dynast) or merely an azat (member of the gentry). Indeed, as we shall see, the term was applicable to municipal ethnarchs and, in time, it would appear, even to mere village chiefs. 1.

We might ask, parenthetically, if indeed even in Arsacid times the term naxarar had a single sense or meaning.

It was pointed out in chapter three that as regards control mechanisms, the Mongols invented nothing new. Furthermore, naxarar reactions to the different control techniques used by the Mongols before and after their Islamization were varied, but also contained no new elements. Naxarar reaction to the invasions was clear: when united military resistance proved impossible, the naxarars holed up in their mountain fortresses; when they learned that the Mongols spared those submitting peaceably, the naxarars submitted, making separate often highly advantageous arrangements with their new overlords. As for the domination, naxarar reactions to Mongol control techniques in the 13-14th centuries may be grouped under five major headings. The lords: (1) attempted when possible to exploit the rivalry between different centers of Mongol authority; (2) rebelled, when feeling themselves sufficiently powerful and when driven to it by Mongol excesses; (3) emigrated from the Armenian highlands in large numbers; (4) Islamized in large numbers, and (5) withstood everything, retaining the Christian faith and also a certain leverage with the Turco-Mongol régimes. Some lords of totally impregnable fortresses became caravan-looters and bandits. Other lords sometimes were able to retain certain privileges and even family lands through the process of giving their lands to religious establishments under the control of clerical representatives of the secular lord's own family.

1 R. Hewsen, "The Meliks"(I) p. 293.

Robert Bedrosian
Long Branch, New Jersey, 1978
APPENDIX A

Supplementary Notes on the 11-13th Century Naxarars

Aspects of the Saljuq invasions and domination are dealt with in chapter two of this study. Here we shall examine features relating directly to the princes in this period, continuing through to the resurgence of Georgia. Supplementary information on institutions of the Zak'arid period likewise is provided. It should be noted, remarkable as it is, that despite Byzantium's inept and disastrous policies vis-à-vis the Armenians, the Saljuqs did in fact meet some Armenian armed resistance. In 1042, for example, Xul Xaçi Arcruni of T'ofnawan attempted a heroic but futile resistance against 15,000 Turkmen in Vaspurakan. In 1042/43, an unspecified number of Turkmen raiding Bjni in northeastern Armenia were defeated by king Gagik Bagratuni and Grigor Magistros Pahlawuni, son of former sparapet Vasek\(^1\). In 1053 the Armenians of Surmari destroyed an army of 60,000 Turks\(^2\). The size of Turkmen detachments going against different parts of Armenia varied from about 5,000 to perhaps 50,000 troops. While these armies are not large by modern standards, it must be remembered that the Saljuqs were a determined

---

1 HAP p. 444.

2 The numbers of combatants, even when given are probably quite inflated. According to Ibn al-Athir, in 1048 a Byzantine army of resistance led by Armenian naxarars in Byzantine service was defeated by the Saljuqs in Basen and prince Liparit Orbēlean was captured and taken to Persia.
"cohesive" fighting force. The same may not be said of the Armenian and Greek forces of Asia Minor.

During and after the invasions, some princes, not wishing to emigrate, or unable to, took to a wandering life, hiding in caves, in some cases perhaps waiting for opportunities to avenge themselves. Others made accommodation with the Saljuqs and retained certain limited rights. Furthermore, the benevolent Saljuq sultan Malik-Shah granted the Armenian churches tax-free status in 1090, upon the request of the kat'olikos. Probably some of the naxarar families were able to retain control of their lands through the clergy. In the absence of the naxarar confederational State, the naxararized Church became the medium of communication for the families. Indeed Smbat Sparapet described kat'olikos Grigor Tla Pahlawuni (1173-93) as being "like a king" in wealth. References in other sources also suggest a partial restoration of lands and privileges under various Muslim overlords. Matthew of Edessa, for example, describing the situation in the time of Malik Ismael Ibn Yaqút (1085-93) wrote "everyone ruled his patrimony in his [Yaqút's] time (amenayn ok' tireal together with 100,000 captives (HAP pp. 449-50).

er hayreneac' iwroc' vawurz norac). According to Vardan Arewelc'i, when the Shaddādīd Manūhihr ruled Ani-Sirak, he recalled from exile Grigor Pahlawuni and restored his holdings\(^1\). Furthermore, Armenians, Greeks and Georgians serving in the armies of the Shāh-Armen and the sultans of Iconium/Konya also received iqtas—originally conditional landholds which quickly became hereditary\(^2\).

The situation of shock and confusion which many cavalrymen or azats, the "gentry", found themselves in, dispossessed from their lands, was described by the late 11th century author Aristakēs Lastiverto'i: "The cavalry wanders about lordlessly, some in Persia, some in Greece, some in Georgia. The sepuh brigade of azats has left its patrimony and fallen from wealth; they growl wherever they happen to be, like lion cubs in their lairs"\(^3\). Members of the azatagundk' havoc', the cavalry of Armenia, clustered around successful bandits like Gol Vasil or Philaretus.

\(^1\) For references and discussion, HAP pp. 497-98.

\(^2\) HAP pp. 495-96.

\(^3\) AL p. 60: "Hecelazorn anterunb ērjēal omn i Parsa, omn i Yovns, omn i Vira. Sepuh gundān azatac 'aleal i hayreneac', ērjēal i ēxut'ēne, mṛnōn ur e sw en ibrew zkoriwns ariwcuc i xētis iwrecac".
Varažnunik' in lands southwest of Armenia. Others found a very warm reception in Georgia. During the reign of David the Restorer (1089-1125), Georgia became a haven for Armenian lords and lordless azats. Matthew of Edessa says that David "received and loved the Armenian people. The remnants of the Armenian forces assembled by him". He also built a special city, Gori, for the refugees: "And he [David] established churches and many monasteries. He named the city Gōfa [Gori] and received all the Armenian people with great joy and gladness".

According to the old medieval Armenian translation of the History of K'art'li ("Juanšēr"), David knew Armenian, and had as his father-confessor the Monophysite vardapet Sarkawag from Halbat monastery.

---

1 One of David's wives was Armenian, and his son Demitre was the issue of that union. MEd p. 447: "Af sa Žokovec’an mnac 'al zork*n Hayoc‘".

2 MEd pp. 447-48: "ew sa šineac' k'ažak' Hayoc' i važzarhn Vrac', ew hastateac' ekelec' is ew vanorays basums, ew anuašneac' žanun k'ažak in Gawray. ew uner mecw uraxut‘eamb ew c nc'/cut eamb zamenayn azgn Hayoc‘".

3 Juanšēr pp. 122-23: "Furthermore, he wanted to unite the Armenians and Georgians [religiously]. He summoned Yovhannes, kat'ožikos of K'art'li, and Areenios K'art'lec'i, translator of Georgian and Greek, and the bishops and vardapets of Armenia, and held a meeting. They examined [matters]from morning until evening, but did not accept each other".
The emigration of Armenians to Georgia, Cilicia, and other parts of the Middle East led to a phenomenon we might call the internationalization of the great families. There were Georgian Bagratida, Armenian Bagratida, Albanian Bagratida, and Graeco-Saljuq Bagratida, and the same applied to the Arcrunids and Orbeleans. The Pahlawunids in particular internationalized. They were hereditary archbishops of Ani from the 11-13th centuries, and also owned property in Mesopotamia and Cilicia, where in the 12th century they became kat'ōikoi. In the 12th century, another branch of the Pahlawunids settled in Egypt and acquired so much influence as veziers, that anti-Armenian riots took place in several Egyptian cities\(^1\). It should be noted, however, that while the internationalization of the great families could and did lead to new trading opportunities and the accumulation of great wealth, such was not always the case. Often the different branches of a given family were in bitter rivalry with each other.

* * *

In dealing with the Georgian nobility, the Bagratid kings of Georgia utilized many of the same methods as did foreign rulers: circumvention of the dynasts whenever possible.

\(^1\) HAP pp. 516-18, 507, 509-510.
manipulation of the nobles' precedence, and "de-naxararization"—removal of the lords. During the 10-12th centuries, Georgian monarchs attempted to circumvent the autochonous dynastic nobility by elevating to official positions, persons of non-noble origin. So many non-nobles (uaznoni) were thus elevated to noble status (aznauroba) that in the 11th century Georgian sources a new term, aizeebulni ("the raised") appeared to designate this growing body. On the military front, the monarchs attempted to circumvent powerful Georgian dynasts by relying on foreign mercenaries (Caucasian mountaineers, Qipoch Turks, Russians), the lesser nobility, and the increasingly influential Armenian émigré element. The availability of non-noble and foreign elements probably gave the Georgian Bagratids more leverage in dealing with dynasts than had been the case in Bagratid Armenia.

Apparently Georgian monarchs also were able to manipulate precedence among the nobles more advantageously than their Armenian cousins. Occupancy of the office of commander-in-chief of the army (the amirspalarate) illustrates this.
Throughout much of the 12th century to 1155, the amirspalara tended to be chosen from the mighty, rebellious Georgian branch of the Orbeleans. In the 1120's the Crown tried

1 Allen p. 229.
2 On the Qipchaqs in Georgia, see I.D. Lordkipanidze, Istoria i uruzii Xi-nachala XIII veka (Tbilisi, 1974).
to counter Orbelean influence by advancing the Abulet'isjes; and in the 1130's the Armenian Kiwrikean Bagratids. In 1155 king David V tried to check the Orbeleans' power by removing them from the amirspasalarate and giving that office to the Orbeleans' principal Georgian rivals, the Abulet'isjes, to whom other important duties had been given. Orbeleans, however, poisoned the king and regained the office, but after amirspasalar Iwane Orbeli's abortive revolt in 1176-77, the office was given to a Qipchaq Turk named Qubasar. In 1184, the Gamrekelis were elevated to the amirspasalarate, and several years later the Armenized Kurdish family of Zak'arean/Mxargrceli. Thus prior to the advent of the Zak'arids, the monarch was able to manipulate precedence by rewarding of office, although from the above it should be clear that the struggle against the dynasts was a continuous ongoing contest. The monarch could never rest or relax vigilance.

2 ibid. p. 49.

3 Allen p. 253.
In the 12th century the Georgian Crown also attempted de-naxararization. This was aimed primarily at the Bagratids' most powerful rivals, the Orbelians. In 1176-77, the Orbelians, hoping to seize the throne, rebelled with the support of many Armenian princes (including the Zak'areans, who were Orbelid vassals at the time). When the rebellion was put down, the entire Orbelian family (excepting two or three males) was exterminated, and the family assets were confiscated. The Georgian Bagratids also practised a less drastic form of de-naxararization, namely the forcible exile of opponents. In the 11th century, the Georgian Bagratids fought their Armenian Kiwrikan cousins, the "kings" of Lori. According to Kirakos Ganjakeci:

Kiwriki Bagratuni, who was from the town of Lori, having opposed the Georgians all his life, kept his patrimony (hayrenik') intact. But after his death [ca. 1090] his sons Dawit' and Abas were deceived by the Georgians and went and received from them as a heritage Tawus and Macnaberd and other places; then, after some days, the Persians took back Tawus, and they dwelt in Macnaberd.

1. Margaryan, pp. 51-52.
2. 50 pp. 128-35.
3. KG pp. 151-52: "Iak Kiwriki Bagratuni, ox i Loren k'ainak', samynayn zamanaks iwr kac sal endemic vrac i hastatut san paher zhayrenic iwr. Tw yet mahuan nora ordik iwr dawalak' i vrac 'elealk' i tan hayrenac, gnac in i parsik, rawit ew Abas, ew atunun i noc ane i zarangut iwr Tawus ew Macnaberd ew zavl teles. Apa yet awurc' atun darjeal parsikk i noc ane zTawus, ew nok a bnaken i Macnaberd...."
The Armenophile David III who ruled Georgia for less than a year (1155/56-1156/57) “showed such benevolence as to send for the King Kiwrike, son of King Dawit’ Bagratuni, and promise to return to him his patrimony which his ancestors had taken away from him; and thus he sent him back with presents, and arranged a meeting”. According to indications in the Albanian Chronicle of Mzit’ar Goš, the Arcrunids who held the position of mayor (amiranet, ġahap) of Tiflis and also owned lands at Kayean and Mahkan-berd, were expelled from the kingdom under king Giorgi III (1156/57-1184), though Giorgi’s successor T’amar restored them in their holdings.

---

1 Dowsett, op.cit., p. 488.

2 Ibid. pp. 488-89: “When he became king, Giorgi made to seize Prince Vasak, for he bore him a grudge, for when he was governor of the town he did not honour him as much as his brother Dawit and would not serve and obey him; other princes of Georgia also speaking ill of him, Vasak fled with his brothers and went to T'iodopolis which is now called the town of Karin [Erzerum]. And the emir named Saltux received him with joy and honor, for when Saltux was captured by the Georgian army whilst he besieged the town of Ani and was brought before King Demetre in Tiflis, Vasak did him many services; because of this, he honored them with gifts and granted them authority over many villages. And having been there for some months, Vasak died and was buried in the church called Astuacacin (Mother of God) in the town. And his standard and clarior and authority were given to his brother called K’urd, and he remained there in great esteem.”
As a result of territorial expansion, especially southwest into historical Armenia, the Georgian monarchy had at its disposal an ample fund of land. Choice sites especially in the Armeno-Georgian borderlands were available for gifts to court officials as rewards for military or other services, or to guarantee loyalty. Now the Crown intended such land gifts to be conditional, that is, they were given to a particular individual for the duration of his life or of his tenure. Such was the situation with the district of Lorê and the amirspasalarate. In 1118 Lorê was Orbelean property. After the dispossessions of the Georgian Orbeleans in 1176-77, Lorê was confiscated and given to the amirspasalar Xubasar. When Xubasar was removed from office in 1184, T'amar left him in all of his holdings except Lorê, by now considered the property of the amirspasalar\textsuperscript{1}. The fact remains, however, that with time, just as appointed offices (such as the amirspasalarate) tended to become hereditary, so did those conditional landholds (such as Lorê) become hereditary within one family (Zak'areans).

\textsuperscript{1} Margaryan, p. 49. Margaryan notes that Kayean until 1176-77 belonged to prince Hasan, from 1185-91, to Vardan Dadian. After 1191 it belonged to Iwane Zak'arean. He suggests that Kayean went to the holder of the office of masxurt'-uxuc'ee, just as Lore went to the amirspasalar(p. 59).
While the study concerns the 13–14th centuries and not merely the Zak'arid restoration, we feel obliged to make some mention of Zak'arid institutions. These institutions have been examined thoroughly by Babayan, most recently. Regrettably, details are lacking concerning the precise workings of political administration in the immediately pre-Mongol period. The brothers Zak'are and Iwane, both notable generals, also held official positions within the Georgian court. Zak'are was the commander-in-chief of the army (amirspasalar) as of 1191, and the mandaturt'-uxuc'es from 1203 on; while his brother, first the maaxurt'-uxuc'es (foremost vezier at court) became atabeg in 1212, an office which was instituted within the Georgian court at Iwane's own request.\(^1\)

---

\(^1\) HAP p. 545; S. Eremyan, Amirspasalar Zak'aria Erkaynabazuk (Erevan, 1944) p. 17: mandaturt'-uxuc'es: "vezier of the seal and head of the queen's bodyguard". The following is a partial listing of Zak'arid family titles compiled from inscriptions and colophons.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Title</th>
<th>Person</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1212</td>
<td>mand. + amirsp.</td>
<td>Atabek Iwane</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1228/29</td>
<td>mand.</td>
<td>Son of Sahnah</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1230/31</td>
<td>amirsp. (VT pp. 73-74)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1231/32</td>
<td>amirsp. (VT p. 74)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1246/47</td>
<td>spasalar (VT p. 90)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1251/52</td>
<td>amirsp. (CIA v. I p. 15)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1258/59</td>
<td>mand.</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1273/74</td>
<td>atabek + amirsp.</td>
<td>Paron Sadun</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1285/86</td>
<td>spasalar Xarkreal &quot;son of the great Sahnah&quot; (VT p. 126).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1291/92</td>
<td>amirsp. Xargriel, son of Sahnah (VT pp. 140-41).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1300/1</td>
<td>paronut'{iwn of atabek amirsp. Sahnah (CIA v. I p. 68).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1321</td>
<td>atabek Sahnah, married to his cousin Xwandze (VT p. 160).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1336</td>
<td>atabek Varham (brother of above), paron of parons (VT pp. 167).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1342/43</td>
<td>atabek Varham (VT p. 167).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1358/59</td>
<td>atabek Zaza (VT pp. 169-70)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1396/97</td>
<td>in the paronut'{iwn of atabek Iwane (14CC p. 614).</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
In the view of L. H. Babayan, the nature of the Zak'arid brothers' service to the Georgian Crown was primarily of a military sort. Armenian lands recaptured from the Turks, he suggests, did not pay taxes to Georgia, but to the Zak'arids who sometimes are styled "kings", "Caesars", and "şahnşahs" in the Armenian sources, apparently in recognition of this.

Within the vast territories under their jurisdiction the two Zak'arid brothers apparently established many of the same offices as existed in the Georgian Court. The men chosen by them to fill these offices were those same individuals who had been instrumental as warriors in the reconquest of Armenian lands. The service (caťavut'ïwn) tendered the Zak'arids by their appointees consisted of military aid and the payment of taxes. Thus, in return for his service, Zak'arē titled Vaçe [Vaçutean] his "prince of princes". Members of the Xaşen aristocracy served as Zak'arid hejubs, chamberlains, court directors, and guardians of Zak'arid children. Prince Bubak, Iwane's subordinate, is styled "prince of princes" and "the great

1 HAP p. 544, VT p. 47; occasionally Zak'arid women are styled queens: VT pp. 71, 74; X pp. 6-7.

2 HAP p. 547

3 HAP p. 550.
sparapet" in the sources. As Babayan notes, Bubak also was known by the Georgian title of masururt'-uruc'es—the same title originally held by Iwanë in the Georgian Court.\(^2\)

1

VT p. 51.

2

HAP p. 549. The following is a partial listing of 13-14th century titles mentioned in inscriptions and colophons.

1207/8 Vaçe, "prince of princes" (VT pp. 48, 58).

[1217/18] "

1210/11 "the great sparapet Bubak" (CIA v. IV p. 69).
1214/15 "the great prince of princes, K'urd" (VT p. 56).

1219/20 Vasak Xalbakean, "koçmnanah[lieutenant][of the lands].
1223/24 "prince of princes, Bubak" (VT v. III p. 123).
1225/26 "I, Dawit'...atabek of the great and mighty prince Sadun" (VT p. 69).

1228/29 heçup Grigor (VT pp. 71-72).
1230/31 Kap ik...general of amirspasalar Sahnah (VT pp. 73-74).
1232/33 Colophon, Yov.Yiğ., pp. 886-87 "prince of princes patron Xawraa".

1236/37 Col. Yov.Yiğ., pp. 909-911; "prince of princes patron Dawit' Sot'[o]fikanc, and his son the brave and renowned patron of patrons Grigor".

1243/44 prince of princes K'urd (VT p. 86).
1244/45 'atabek and amirspasalar Xut'eubul (VT p. 87).
1244/45 K'urd, prince of princes (VT p. 87).
1248/49 Hasan Jalal's wife Mam' an "daughter of the king of Bašk" (VT pp. 92-93).
1251/52 "I, Mam' an, queen, wife of [Hasan]Jalal Dawl[a]
(VT p. 96).
1251/52 koçmnakal Tarasayiğ, prince of princes,..."brother of king Smbat" (VT p. 94).
1252/53 "king Jalal Dawl[a]" (VT p. 96).
1260/61 Smbat "prince of princes" (CIA v. III p. 218 foldout).
1282/83 "the great sparapet Varham" (CIA v. III p. 50; VT

During the 1280's many inscriptions begin using the terms
paron and paronut 'iwn:

1289/90 "prince of princes, paron Buit'ay" (CIA v.I p. 22).
1295/96 "prince of princes Burt'-el" (VT p. 136).
1296/97 "in the paronut 'iwn of the prince of princes Grigor"
(CIA v. IV p. 355; also VT p. 139).
This lends credence to the view that the Zak'arids created a partial microcosm of the Georgian Court hierarchy on their own lands.

Other important offices (gorcakalut‘iwnk’) fleetingly referred to in the sources are the kožmnakalut‘iwnk’ or lieutenancies. In Zak'arid Armenia there were three of them, held by three major families: in Siwnik’, the Orbeleans, in Ayrarat the Vağuteans, and in Vayoc‘ for the 1296/97 Mina khatun, the royal queen, daughter of the great lieutenant of Albania, Jalal (CIA v.III p. 237; VT p. 138).

1307 Colophon,14CC p.42, prince of princes Burt'el.
1307 Wife of Hasan the asparapet of Armenia (CIA v.III p.76; VT p. 154).
1322 Col.14CC p. 166; “in the generalship and princedom of this district [Glajor] of Burt‘el and Amir Hasan”.
1324 Col. 14CC p. 182, “the king of Georgia and Greater Armenia, Gawrg, the prince of princes of the House of Siwnik’, asparapet Burt‘el”.
1337/38 Col.14CC p. 292, "for the paron of parons, P'oqen, heir of the royal line of Greater Armenia and his son Blikum, 'born in the purple'.
1338/39 Kurd Anberdec'î, prince of princes (VT p. 166).
1341/42 Col.14CC p. 328; "in the consulship and asparapet-ut‘iwn of Armenia of Biwrit‘el [Orbelean].
1400/1 Col.14CC p. 632, "the princedom of paron Smbat and Burdel".
Xalbakean-Prőšean. Babayan reasonably suggests that the kukmnakals were endowed with some administrative-judicial powers. The same author believes that the amiras or emirs were city mayors who stood at the head of an elaborate but poorly-understood governing body which included clergy and wealthy laymen. It is clear from inscriptions that at times even the administrative heads of large villages were appointed directly from the top, in one case by Iwane himself.
The sources also contain a welter of terms such as tanutur, gaherec jéme, patronac patron and others, some known from the dawn of Armenian writing, others new. However, the manner in which the real content of such terms changed over time is not clearly known. Often titles such as šahnšah or marzban appear as the given names of individuals who held titled official positions, adding to the confusion.

1 HAP p. 552.
2 HAP p. 553; VT pp. 50, 52, 68.
3 The following are some random examples of the confusion resulting from the use of titles as proper names.

1206/7 amirspasa lar Zak'are calls himself Zak'aré Sahnšah 1208/9 Sahnšah Zak'aria (CIA v. I p. 6; VT p. 49; CIA v.I
(VT p. 47).
p. 5; VT p. 49).
1209/10 in the world reign of the šahnšah Zak'aré and Iwane (VT p. 50).
1210/11 Sahnšah Zak'aria (CIA v. I p. 55).
1211/12 Marcpan, son of Sargiš Hamazaspeanc (VT p. 52).
1212/13 Sahnšah Zak'aria (VT p. 54).
1215/16 Sahnšah Zak'aria, son of Sahnšah Sargis (CIA v.I p.2).
1220/21 amirspasa lar Sahnšah Sargis (meaning Zak are's son, Sahnšah) (CIA v.I p. 17).
1221/22 I, Marcpan, son of Sargis...(VT p. 64).
Furthermore, since the political reality of the time was Armeno-Georgian and not exclusively Armenian, sometimes Georgian titulary is used alongside the Armenian, increasing the confusion.

1232/33 Col. Yov. Yiğ., pp. 886-87, "the Caesars of Armenia Georgia, and all Abxazia".

1234/35 "I, T'aguhi, wife of Sarap'sah (VT p. 78).
1234/35 "I, T'ayk T'aguhi, daughter of Sarap'sah (VT pp. 78, 112).

1234/35 "I, T'ayk T'aguhi, daughter of Sarap'sah (VT pp. 78, 112).

1243/44 Hasan Jalal's son is named At'abak (VT p. 86).
1245/46 "Aslanbeg, son of Maropan" (VT pp. 88-89).
1252/53 "I, Smbat, son of Hejub" (VT p. 96).
1276/77 At'abak, lord of Xaçen (VT p. 118).
1281/82 T'aguhi, daughter of the presbyter ter(lord) Sahak (VT p. 122).
1293/94 Hejub's brother's son (VT p. 136).
1320 Heçup (CIA v. IV p. 123; VT p. 159).

1
For example:
1206/7 amirsparasal Sarap'ak called himself the zawarapet of Armenia and Georgia (VT p. 47).
1211/12 Sarap'ak "amirsparasal of Armenia and Georgia (VT p. 53).
1214/15 Awaq, the "coronant of Georgia" (VT p. 56).
1219/20 Iwane, atabek of Armenia and Georgia (VT p. 62).
1223/24 "the amirsparasalare of Armenia and Georgia of Sahnsah" (VT p. 62).

A classic example of the confusion of Armenian and Georgian titles is the curious and regrettably unique passage in SO p. 100 which mentions the dignitaries summoned by atabek Iwane (ca. 1224) to participate in a judicial decision: "...[Iwane] ordered his grandees to sit and examine the matter: Bubak and the marcuan [proper name or title?], Iwane the dpel and the memnas8iel [title, or proper name Memna Jaqeli?], the great ciawnditel (bishop) who had come from the kingdom, the girm ciawr (abbot) of Varji and the abbot of Panjahank, the great mamt'avar (patriarch) of Gar-šte, the Gageck'ik', and the Macnaberdec'ik' and in addition, many other didebule: the gadi of Dwin and the one called the šex of Surmari. [Among the examiners were also] the great bishop of Ani, the bishop of Bjni, and the bishop of Hazbat". See L.Melik set'-Bek', "A Testimony about the Structure and Procedure of the Supreme Court in Zak'arid Armenia", Telekagir #3-4(1945) pp. 75-79(in Arm.).

1232/33 Col. Yov. Yiğ., pp. 886-87: "Now this Bible...was requested by...the honorable prince of princes Patron Xawfas, son of Amir Sargis, who was the brother of the mother of the Caesars of Armenia, Georgia, and all Abkhazia...the great Zak'are and Iwane...before whom he was nourished and grew up...After great Zak'are's untimely passing to Christ—which plunged the land of Armenia into darkness—his well-favored descendant...the mand-atort'axuc'ea of the great kingdom, Sahnash, succeeded to the throne of his father's kingdom...May Jesus Christ keep him in peace...and also keep his son Zak'are 'born into the crown' (t'agacin)....The same loyalty was shown by the very honorable prince of princes Xawfas educating and nourishing him with all piety and devoutness as he had been educated by his forbears—from whom as recompense for his loyal service, he received a great honor [of the office] of meaxurt'axuc'ea in Georgian which translates into our [Armenian] language as 'chief and commander of all the rulers and chiefs of the royal house of his lord' (glux išxec'ot'ew hramanatar amenayn išxec'ołac'ew glxawor-ac tan t'agaworut san tealin iwroy)".
APPENDIX B

Aspects of Centrifugalism within and among Certain 13-14th Century Naxarardoms

The 13th and 14th centuries were characterized by conflicts within and among certain Caucasian naxarardoms. In some cases these conflicts pertained to families (e.g., the Georgian Bagratids, the Zak'arean/Mzargrcelis, the Kaxaberijes of Rača, the Orbēlean/Orbelis, the Aroroni/Mahkanaberdelis, the Jaqelis), in other cases, to the "naxarardoms" of the Church(es). The conflict within the Georgian royal family was extremely serious and must be mentioned not only as an example of centrifugalism at the very pinnacle of authority in Christian Caucasus, but also because of its devious ramifications. On his deathbed, king Giorgi Laša Bagratuni (d. 1223) was promised by his sister Rusudan that Giorgi's child son David Lašaean would receive the throne on his maturity. Rusudan (d. ca. 1245) then became "king" of Georgia. Rather than honoring the pledge made to her late brother, Rusudan instead banished and imprisoned David Lašaean and enthroned her own son (also named David). While co-optation of the heir hardly was a new feature in Georgia, its almost inevitable result was the polarization of the nobility into two hostile camps. Eventually the authority of the "usurper" David Rusudanean was challenged by the matured embittered David Lašaean. Between 1250 and 1258, Georgia thus had two kings simultaneously. The line of David Lašaean occupied the throne in Tiflis until 1289, but from 1291 to 1318 a system of collegial sovereignty existed in Georgia whereby Lašaean kings were forced to share the realm with co-kings—their very sons, or candidates from the rival line of David Rusudanean.

Hostile relations among prominent families had at their base disputes over land. From the order of Kirakos Ganjakec'i's narration, one might (incorrectly) assume that the amirspasalar Awag Zak'arean was the first Armenian prince to surrender to the Mongols (1236) and consequently his holdings were not disturbed by the conquerors. However, Kirakos' junior contemporary, Step'annos Orbelean, placed the submission of Elikum Orbelean before that of Awag, and the point is revealing and crucial. For the Armenian Orbeleans, prior to the

---

2 KG pp. 255-56.

3 SO pp. 149-50: "...Taking [Elikum] as a guide [the Mongols' commander Aslan-noyin ] went as far as Ani, subduing everyone. He took Vayoc' Jor and Eiegis as far as Ereror village which stands opposite Garni, and gave it all to Elikum, saying: 'That which was taken by the sword and that which was bought with gold are equally the patrimony of man. Now these districts which I have taken with my sword shall be yours as patrimony and the patrimony of your line. Do you now faithfully look upon us and serve the Great Khan who sent us here'. And Elikum with great heartfelt thanks served them. From that day forth it was confirmed that those [lands] would be the patrimony of the Orbelean tum(House) and line. Now other commanders subordinated other lands and brought out of Kayen fortress, Awag. They took the invasions, had been clients of the Iwane-Awagids, yet from Step’annos’ account it appears that the Orbeleans (with Mongol approval) had expanded their holdings at Awagid expense, at the time of the conquest itself. Enmity over the Orbelean expansion may have accounted for Elikum’s death, as Step’annos suggested, and enmity marked Zak’arid-Orbelean relations for some decades to follow. Elikum was succeeded by his polyglot brother Smbat.

...But after Elikum’s death the tun (House) of Awag treated the Orbelean tun with great jealousy, and enmity especially Awag’s wife. They wanted to disperse and persecute the, or to destroy the surviving children, Smbat and his brothers. They [the Awagids] seized their patrimony while [the Orbeleans] wandered about in concealment, here and there until the compassionate love of the Creator willed to restore and strengthen the Orbelean tun through Smbat... 2.

The significance of the underlined “especially Awag’s wife” appears to have escaped modern scholars. Curiously, it appears that the line of Gonc’a, daughter of the duke Kaxaberii of Rač, descended from a Georgian branch of the Orbeleans. Consequently, Gonc’a’s enmity toward

1 SO p. 150 suggests that Elikum was murdered by physicians at the command of Awag.

2 SO p. 151.

3 Toumanoff, Studies, p. 211 n. 238.
Smbat may have had elements of an intra-family feud. It is interesting too (and similarly unremarked by scholars) that the Awagid-Orbëlean land dispute resulting from the Mongol conquest has been carried over into the sources more than once, and in more than one way. For example, in relating one and the same story—how Smbat Orbëlean aided a fugitive monarch—Step'annos Orbëlean mentions the incident as occurring on Smbat's land, whereas the History of K'art'li describes the same territory as "the land of atabek Awag".

The importance and severity of the [Kaxiberije]-Awagid-Orbëlean feud led Smbat to the Far East on two occasions, for protection and confirmation of "his lands". The first visit (ca. 1252) resulted in Smbat's vindication. But the

---

1 So pp. 152-53; KC p. 228; Mur. p. 103.

2 So p. 157: "They gave him a golden p'ayiza which is a tablet bearing the names of God and of the king, their greatest honor. They also drew up a varlighe (saflex) which we call sigel—a command—and gave him all that Aslan had taken by the sword and Orotn with its lands...and the gortress of Borotn with its provisions, as the blood-price for the murder of his father Liparit. Furthermore they removed Smbat['s name] from the daw'tars of the Georgians and others. This was the second confirmation of their patrimony, for the first [time] it was taken by the sword, when [Smbat] was a servant, by the agency of Aslan-novin; while the second time [it was received] as a gift from the Khan...".
Awagids were unwilling to accept this verdict, and plotted to destroy Smbat:

Now while these [events] were so [unfolding] that wicked Satan started stirring up envy and inciting the tun of Awag and the Georgian grandees [against Smbat]. Awag had died in the year 1250/51 (699 A.E.). His wife had a daughter named Košak', and ruled all of his principedom. They assembled in Tiflis near Arghun, for the great Khan had designated him vezier and passaz (overseer) over all the lands, i.e., commander of all and ruler of the royal taxes and the great diwan. [It was he] who made a census of all the lands in 1254/55 (703 A.E.). With numerous bribes they requested Smbat's destruction and that he not be able to hereditarily transmit his country. Arghun did not dare accede to this request, but he did take away from Smbat many places, and severely oppressed the remainder.

Smbat made a second journey to the Far East ca. 1257, and had his rights reconfirmed. Meanwhile Gone'a Kaxiberije-Awagean had married the Georgian king, David Lašaean.

1 So p. 159: "Iṣak min iva ayanes liner, apa batiateac'ın satanay eksax naxani Ārkanel, ew gzerel ztynn Awacin ex zmecamecan Vrac': ew zi Awacn vaxcanel er i 699 i win ew kın nora Gong ayn uner dustr me Košak anun. ew ixe amenay isxanit ean nora. vaan orov žolovec' an i Top žic a' Arkunn or er vazir ew pāsa (tzuç') kargeal i mec žanen i veray amenav n aşarhas, aysink'n hramanatar amenev un ew ixeč o' arı uni harkac n ew mec diwanin, or arar aşarhatir zaşarha amenay y703 t'wakaniq: Ew bazum kasatrok xndrein korusanen zSmbat ew o' žatangel uc anel gzerk nora, zor ew o' hamariaker Arìunn, ayl afın i Smbatat bazum teiše. ew zmac'ealsen kešek' ein sastkapes".

2 So p. 161.
The birth of their son Demitre created a Bagratid-Kaxaberije-Awagean link. The struggle of families was by no means over, however:

...Now Smbat planned, with the other princes to become the "adopted father" of Awag's son; by order of Hülegü-Khan they had Gonc'a drowned in the sea, and he, Smbat, ruled over all of Awag's princedom. He gave Awag's daughter Xošak in marriage to the great sahipdiwan Xoja [brother of the historian Juvayni]...This occurred in 1269/70 (718 A.E.).

According to Step'annos, the Georgian monarch David Leşaean and Smbat were on the best of terms: "King David so loved Smbat that he considered him his equal, and placed the little boy Demitre in his hands, giving his son to him". Once again the enmity of families has left...

1 SO p. 165: "Isk Smbatay hayragir leal tann Awagin xorhi end ayi isxanac n. ew tan spananel i covamili zuonc ayn, hramaw Hulawu țanin. ew ink n isxer amen ayn isxanut eanc Awagin. Ew tay zdustr nora Xoşak n 1 knut iwn mec Xoja'vin sahip diwanin...ew er aye y718 tuin". KC p. 251; Mur. p. 123: "Now Awag's former wife, the queen Gonc'a, was killed when located among the Tatars, as they say; and it was at the urging of her daughter Xošak, wife of the sahibdiwan khoja Shams-ad Din that she was killed".

2 SO p. 168.
its imprint in the literary sources, creating a contradiction. According to the History of K'art'li, it was to Sadun Arcruni, not to his rival Smbat, that Xošak' and care for the Awagid holdings were entrusted. Nor does the same work dwell on the close relations between the king and Smbat.

Allegedly Smbat extracted a concession from king David. He convinced the king to destroy a document relating to the time of the expulsion of the Orbelis from Georgia (because of their involvement in the abortive rebellion of 1176/77). Whether the Armenian Orbelians were able to reclaim the old family possessions in Georgia is unclear from the sources, though Smbat's "exceeding delight" at

1 KC p. 236; Mur. p. 110: "At that time, Awag was dead, having left no male heir, but only a daughter named Xošak'.
In tears the king went to Bjni. He saw Awag's fair wife, Gonc'a, the daughter of Kaxaberije, duke (erist'ay) of Rač. He fell in love with her and after a short while, made her queen. He brought her to his kingdom. As for Awag's daughter, he left her in her patrimonial holdings and entrusted her to Sadun Mahkan-aberdeli".

2 KC p. 237; Mur. p. 109-110: "The fact that Gonc'a had become queen was displeasing to the mestumre Jik'uri, since they were enemies. So on the advice of Smbat Orbeli [word] was spread about that Jik'uri had sent someone to Arghun to reveal to Hülegü-Khan the [size of the] king's wealth, and his intention to rebell".
the king's action, reminiscent of Elikum's "heartfelt thanks" to Aslan noyin strongly suggests that some partial restitution was made to the Orbéleans.

1. SO pp. 168-69: "Then the king called Smbat to Tiflis and wanted to show his gratitude to him through very great gifts. He asked Smbat: 'What great gifts shall I bestow upon you? For whatever in my kingdom you wish, whatever you find agreeable, I shall give you unsparingly'. Smbat arose and prostrated himself: 'Oh king, whatever we have is/was [given by] you and your forbears. This much is enough for us; but there is one thing I request from you'. The king responded: 'I swear that I shall give you whatever you ask for'. Smbat said: 'Then obliterate that wicked memory of us, through which your forbear, [ing] Georgi slandered my ancestors. For he had written [a document] with curses, such that we not be allowed into our patrimony, and he had it placed in his treasury. Give that [document] to me'. The king was astonished and despised his father for removing from his tun such powerful and capable men. And he ordered his attendants to search for and bring that document (girk*: "writing, letter, book"). They went, located it, and quickly brought it. The king took it in his hand and stood up, saying: 'Behold, Smbat, take the document you requested'. Smbat arose, prostrated himself, and replied: 'Oh king, who so forgave the past, show me [yet another] kindness. That book was written by a king's hand; it must be destroyed by a king's hand. Order that a fire be kindled before yourself, and throw that book into the flames with your own hand'. At once the king commanded that a fire be struck up. He pulled out his sword, tore out the pages, and threw them into the fire. Whereupon Smbat was exceedingly delighted and thanked him. After this, the king gave him many other magnificent gifts and robes of honor and further distinguished him and sent him home. In this manner did Smbat remove the stigma attached to his ancestors, and left a good reputation for those succeeding [him]".
According to Stepa'annos, the preeminence of Orbeleans in Caucasian affairs continued after Smbat "passed from this world in a chariot of angels"—probably murdered while in Tabriz (1274). Smbat's heir, his younger brother Tarsayič supposedly enthroned Demitre "with great effort" as king of Georgia. But the History of K'art'li describes matters differently. Sadun Ar-cruni's great influence is noted, while Tarsayič Orbelean is not even mentioned:

During this period Sadun Mahkanaberdeli had become stronger than all his contemporary princes, since Abaqa liked him. And [Sadun] started to be caretaker of all Georgia's affairs, because [the king] had entrusted [to his care] lord atabek Awag's daughter, while Košak' had given him the ejjibdom.

Then all the didebuls of Georgia assembled and took the royal Demitre to the Horde. They went to Sahnšah's son, Iwane, the mandat'urt—uxuc’es, and he too went to the Horde where they saw to it that Demitre received the reign... [Abaqa-Khan] gave the entire kingdom to him, excepting [the lands of] Sargis Jaqeli. He sent him back to Sadun whom king Demitre made atabek. 3.

1 SO p. 166.
2 SO p. 171: "bazum Janiw".
3 KC pp. 269-70; Mur. p. 150.
According to the History of K'art'li, Sadun was made atabek by the new Georgian monarch, and upon his death (d. 1281/82) his son Xut'ulu'ba Arcruni received Sadun's property and the office of spaspeti. Step'annos Orbelean wrote the following:

...[Arghun-Khan] liked Demitre greatly. He gave Demitre the entire land of Armenia, the tun (House) of Awag and the tun of Sahnsah and of the Gagec'ik and the sons of atabek Sadun...

...Then Demitre returned [to the Caucasus] with great joy and all the azats and grandees of Georgia and Armenia with him. When he reached Sarur, Tarsayiç came before him and magnified the king with great honor and royal gifts. [Demitre] took him to his Awagean country, Ayrarat, and greatly entreating him, forced him to be atabek over his entire lordship, from Tiflis to Ani and Kars. He also entrusted Tarsayiç with his young sons, Dawit' and Manuel whom he raised and kept. Thereafter Tarsayiç held the atabekate of the land of Armenia and did many things to lighten[the lot of] the harassed Armenian people...

King Demitre "sent his little son David to the house of atabek Awag so that he would grow up there and have a place of his own among the princes of Armenia..."

1
KC p. 281; Mur. p. 150.

2
According to the History of K'art'li, the property of atabek Awag, before being entrusted to king Demitre "belonged to the sahipdiwan", i.e., to Shams ad-Din Juvaini (KC p. 285; Mur. p. 153). So pp. 172-73: "Ew er and nora t'agaworn Demetre, zor sirac' Ariunn, ew et nma zamenayn asxarhs Hayoc' ztunn Awagean ew ztunn Sahnsahean ew Gagec' in ew zordiaw Sadun at abekin..."
share in the property of the royal line. The Orbeleans are not mentioned here. The sources themselves are in conflict over who was the more important naxarar in this period, but what is important here is the evidence of conflict among the families. Indeed, within the Orbelean family itself quarrels arose among the children of Tarsayiś after his death (1290).

Conflicts among the secular lordly families were paralleled by conflicts among the clerical nobility. As the history of the Armenian Church in this period has been studied in elaborate detail in Ormanian's Azgapatum, here we shall note only some of the major divisions which led to unlimited conflict and rivalry. First, there were religious differences within the two branches of the Zak'arid family itself. Though Zak'ar remained true to Armenian Monophysitism, his brother Iwane "converted" to Georgian Chalcedonian Orthodoxy. Nor was Iwane an exceptional case. Many Armenians,

2 SO pp. 177-78: "...But then his sons commenced arguing over their father's lordships and princedom. They went to the royal court and stood before the ruler Arghun-Khan and familiarized him with their debate. Arghun called forth the senior son, Elikum, appointed him to his father's place and set him as prince over all. However, although Elikum ruled all of his father's patrimonies and princedom, nonetheless he did not want to deprive his brothers. So he divided the entire inheritance with the advice of the bishops, vardapets and azats. He gave a suitable portion to his brother's son, Liparit." especially those living and working in Georgia or in the Armeno-Georgian borderlands had come under the influence of Chalcedonianism. These Armenian Chalcedonians performed the Greek rite in the Armenian language. The sources contain frequent allusions to rancor and enmity between Armenian Monophysites and Armenian Chalcedonians\(^1\). The disputes occasionally took the form of land disputes between monasteries\(^2\).

Second, Roman Catholicism began to have an impact on Armenian religious affairs. In the 13th century, for complicated reasons, the Cilician Armenian monarchy and kat'olikosate and certain circles in Greater Armenia began encouraging the idea of religious union with Rome\(^3\).

---

1 VA p. 143; Zak'are and Iwane attempted to forcibly unite the Armenian Monophysite and the Georgian Chalcedonian Churches, unsuccessfully (KG pp. 166-67; the Annals of Bishop Step'annos, MG vol. 1 p. 38). The center of Georgian Chalcedonianism in northern Armenia was the monastery of Šnjahank', on which see P.M. Muradyan, "Vrac'eren arjanagru't'yunner Hayastanum: Šnjahank' [Georgian Inscriptions in Armenia: Šnjahank']" Lрабer #1 (1973) pp. 39-57, as well as the same author's first article, "Georgian Inscriptions in Armenia" describing the inscriptions at Hnevank', Sanahin, and Hałbat, Тәләкагир #3 (1966) pp. 30-47.

2 KG p. 222.

In 1316 at the Council of Adana, union was made\(^1\). But although a number of vardapets and bishops agreed to union, others rejected Latinophile policies outright\(^2\):

During the tenure as kat'olikos of Yakob Ssec'i (1327-41, 1355-59), Sis and Ejmiacin broke over the issue\(^3\).

But by that time the Dominicans had won over to Catholicism the influential Yovhannes K'fnec'i of southern Siwnik', who began attracting to Catholicism his former fellow classmates\(^4\). The fight against the Armenian Catholics of K'rna preoccupied the Armenian Church leadership for much of the 14th century. During the reign of Yakob Ssec'i, matters had deteriorated to the point that the Cilician kat'olikos supported K'rna's efforts against Ejmiacin\(^5\).

---

1 Petrowicz pp. 363-64.

2 As Petrowicz notes, the signatures of those favoring unity, appearing on the protocols of the Council of Adana, indicate support from numerous parts of Armenia: (all bishopg) Vardan of Ani, Yovhannes Marandunsanc', Yovhannes of Taron, Markos of Kars, Yakob of Salmast, Grigor of Maraş, Nerses of Kamax, Awetik' of Np'rkert, Vardan of Sasun, Filippos of Xořjean, Stepan'annos of Colonean (HA p. 367).

3 Petrowicz pp. 364-65.

5 Ibid. pp. 466-67.
A third source of conflict came from the very existence of the kat'olikosate (or anti-kat'olikosate) of Ait'amar. The kat'olikosate and its jurisdiction were denounced and "nullified" by the kat'olikosate of Sis in the early 12th century, but this did not put an end to Ait'amar's independent development. Kat'olikos Grigor Anawarzec'i (1293-1307) attempted, unsuccessfully, to bring Ait'amar into allegiance with Sis and Ejmiacin. In 1408/9 the noted cleric and scholar Grigor Tat'ewac'i removed his diocese of K'ajberunik from communion with Ait'amar, but the general anathema imposed on the kat'olikoi of Ait'amar remained in effect until 1441. The kat'olikosate of Ait'amar continued its existence until 1895.

3 ibid. pp. 144-45.
4 ibid. p. 148. Yet another special "center" of the Church was the district of Siwnik' in eastern Armenia, an area traditionally known for its separatist tendencies. The political independence of Siwnik' in this period was paralleled by jurisdictional independence in religious matters. Thus the historian Step'annos Orbelean was ordained in Cilicia in 1287/88, "metropolitan of the great see of Siwnik', above all the other bishops here and there, some in Vayoc' Jor and some in Tat'ew" (SO p. 174). To my knowledge, Step'annos was the first cleric in Armenia to be styled metropolitan, a new term perhaps to match Siwnik' s unique position (VT p. 137, also CIA v. II p. 78). In any case the erudite Step'annos appears to have maintained good relations with Sis and with the clerical nobility of Greater Armenia. It is known, for example, that Step'annos was a close friend of kat'olikos Zak'aria I of Ait'amar (1296-1336) and requested from him a copy of T'ovma Arcruni's History of the Arcrunid House (10th cent.)[TA p. 319]. For the most part, however, relations among the various Armenian Christian groups—just as relations among the important secular naxarardoms—were characterized by bitter conflict and rivalry.
Given the numerous sources of conflict, within and among families, and within and among religious institutions, the foreign rulers of Armenia in the 13-14th centuries did not have great difficulty keeping the naxarars divided—it was the natural state of affairs.

APPENDIX C

Notes on the Relations between the Mongols and the Armenian Church in the 13th Century

1. Philo-Christianity and Taxation of the Church

During the 13th century, the presence of numerous Christian Mongols in the Mongol court and army had many different ramifications. General statements to the effect that the Mongols were philo-Christian or that the Church and its hierarchy were not taxed during the domination are misleadingly inaccurate. While specific Mongols were philo-Christian, and though churches under the jurisdiction of certain naxarar families were not always taxed, the situation changed from ruler to ruler.

The earliest information on relations between the Mongols and the Armenian Church is found in Kirakos Ganjakec'i's History and relates to the first appearance of the Mongols in the Caucasus, ca. 1220/21:

...False information came concerning them to the effect that they were mages and/or of the Christian faith—wonder-words—and that they had come to avenge the Christians from the tyranny of the Tačiks. And it was said that they had with them a portable tent-church and a miracle-working cross and that they would bring and throw an epah of barley before this cross and all the soldiers would take from it, and give it to their horses and the supply would not be exhausted...Such false rumors filled the land. Therefore the inhabitants of the country did not fortify themselves in, to the point that one lay presbyter, taking his people, even went before [the Tatars] carrying [in procession] hooded crosses. The enemy put them to the sword, one and all. 1.

The Mongols' motives in this instance, during their reconnaissance mission of 1220/21 simply may have been to terrorize the population. However it is not impossible that the unfortunate Christian welcoming party was mistaken for a band of secular princes. According to Kirakos Ganjakeci, when in 1236 the Mongols returned to the Caucasus and in subduing the region captured the great cleric and scholar Vanakan vardapet, they thought that he was a secular prince and pressed him for information about fortresses and the whereabouts of the Armenian lords 2. In any case, in 1236 the Mongols did not exterminate the intellectuals who had fallen into their hands. Vanakan,

---

1 KG p. 202: "Ew hambaw stut'san gavr znoc'ane, t'e mogk' en ew k'ristoneayk' hawatoy, ew n'anagorok' ew ekeal en i vrezynrub iwn k'ristoneic', or i bref enen tacak'c. Ew asein, t'e unin ekelec' i vraneay ew xaç ak ançelagorç ew bereal kapič mi gari arkanen atal fak'in, ew amanavn zork'na alel i amene tanin tan evivanac' invaeńc', ew of nakasi. ay1 ibrew amatin amenek' san i taneloy, novnçar' kaplic anden mnav...Ew avsipi hambaw stut san ic' ew vasxarba. Yasn avsyrik of amrac an bnačiç' anaxarin. minçaw arec' mi ascxarhakan' aleal szciovurç iwr., ew kaçiyk' yatelovk. ant ac' aw end atal noc'a. Ew noc'a sur i verav edeal' kotorec in znosa ar hasarak...".

2 KG p. 246.
his student Kirakos, and many other clerics were forced to serve the Mongols as secretaries, "writing and reading letters."

A definite improvement in conditions for Christians of the Mongol Middle East was achieved by the Syrian doctor of the Church, Rabban in 1241/42. Thanks to 1 KG p. 249: "Ata a tfin ew ziia wynkerew jwoc' zkni lwreano i putr une grel t uat ew ent cnuul...".

2 KG pp. 276-77: "...He was known as the 'father of the Khan', since in Syriac raban means vardapet, while in Mongolian at'a means father. As soon as he heard about the merciless killing of the Christians occasioned by the Tatar troops, he approached the Khan and beseeched him for a letter to give the Tatar troops, commanding them not to kill innocent people the way they were doing, people who had notwarred against them, but instead [the Mongols should] let them alone so that they might serve the king. With great pomp the Khan sent Raban himself to his commanders with a written order that all obey his command. "When Raban arrived, many things turned propitious for the Christians and the killings and captures ceased. He likewise built churches in Tačik cities where previously no one dared utter the name of Christ—even in Tabriz and the city of Naxšawan which were yet more inimical to the Christians, so much so that Christians [dwelling there] did not dare appear or walk abroad openly, to say nothing of constructing a church or erecting a cross. Yet Raban erected cross and church, and the sounding-board was heard day and night. Christians openly took their dead for burial, carrying [in the procession] hooded crosses, gospels, and worshipping after the Christian custom. Those opposing them were put to death. No one dared come out against [Raban's] order. On the contrary, the Tatar army revered him like their king, and without Raban, they neither planned nor did anything...And those merchants who had his tamgha that is to say, insignia, boldly circulated throughout the lands and no one dared approach those who mentioned Raban's name. Instead all the Tatar commanders gave him gifts from their booty".
Raban's efforts, Nersès, kat'olikos of Caucasian Albania was taken to Chormaghun's wife, Altana:

...They gave [Nersès] gifts and an al-tamgha, so that no one would harass him, and they gave him a Moḥal Tatar guide who took him throughout his dioceses in Albania. For a long while neither [Nersès] nor his predecessors had dared to circulate throughout the dioceses due to the blood-thirsty and bestial nation of Tačiks. Now [Nersès] passed throughout his dioceses, returning peacefully to his residence in Xamši monastery...

In 1247/48, the kat'olikos Kostandin of Cilicia sent to Greater Armenia gifts and money for the embellishment of the monastery of St. T'adeos, which was then elevated to a diocese. This renovation work was entrusted to a vardapet Yovsep' and was expedited by the Mongols:

And Yovsep' went to a Tatar commander named Angurak noyin whose summer quarters were close by the tomb of the blessed apostle T'adeos. And on his command, Yovsep' blessed the church and held the pre-consecration ceremony, built a monastery and assembled many clerics in it. The Tatar man enlarged the roads on all sides [so that] all pilgrims could come amongst his troops fearlessly. He commanded strictly that no one wishing to come be harassed, and he humbled himself to them with love. And many of them came and baptized their sons and daughters, and many who were possessed by devils and were sick became healed, and the name of our Lord Jesus Christ was glorified.

---

1 KG pp. 291-92: "...Etun nma pargewa ew ʿältamḥayas, zi mi'ok' neces e zna; etun nma moḥal t at ar alajnord, or tareal ʿarles dyc zna yešarın Atukan, ʿi vičak ʾiw, zi yoḥov ʿezanak elin, or ot na ew ʿoc ʾork yarafal k an zna, ʿoʾišešin ʿarles end vičakeša ʾiwreand yahage ʿarlan ʿiw, ew gazanabaroy azin tačak; šk nora ʿarles end vičakešaš darjaw andren xalašut cem ʾi teši ʾiw, ʾi vanen Xamši".

To my knowledge, the implications of certain statements in the sources concerning the tax status of the Armenian churches have not been thoroughly understood. According to Step'annos Orbelean, prior to Smbat Orbelean’s visit to the Far East in 1252/53, the churches of Orbelean Siwnik’ were being taxed “bitterly”. In Mönge-Khān’s

---

1 KG pp. 311-12: "Ew Yovaen’ay ort’gal at zoraglux mi T’at’arin, orum anun er Anagurak-nuin, orov ilawank’u iwr yawrusn amaryrov hug er i gerezman surb atak elovn T’adeosi, ew nor<ə hramanaw erbeal seke<əc’in ew nawakatis katareal sineac zvanen ew zo<ovac’ in na kronawora bazum<ə.

Ew ayr T’at’ar endarjakeac’ zcanapar’ha vamenaun kolmanc anerkiwë gal uxtakanac’ in end mei zorac’ nor<ə, patuer hramani tueal sashtuk sambo mi sok’ zzuwel ew nekel, or kemic’ in gal, ew ink’n sirov xonarher at posa. ‘Ew bazum<ə’ i noc unc’ gayin ew mktein zuster<ə ew zduster<ə iwreac’... ew bazum avsa<əh’ ew hiwand’ bazkein, ew p arawor liner anun teatn meroy Yesusi 𐐫ristosi’.

2 SO p. 154.
presence, Smbat complained about the harassment of the churches\(^1\), and received from Möngke "a decree freeing all the churches of Armenia and the priests", a statement repeated twice\(^2\). With encouragement from Baiju's wife, Smbat renovated Siwnik's religious seat Tat'ew (then in a dilapidated condition)\(^3\). Kirakos and the History of K'art'li very clearly state that as a result of emir Arghun's census of 1255, neither Church nor clergy was to be taxed\(^4\). However, in 1257 when Hasan Jalal visited Batu-Khan in the North, he pointed out that Nereōs, kat'olikos of Albania still was being harassed. He was given a written order that such harassment should stop\(^5\).

\(^1\) SO p. 155.

\(^2\) SO p. 155: "Ey hrman ēt azatel sameyn ekelec'is Hayoc ew sk ahaneys"; SO p. 158: "Ey azateac ek elec'is ew sk ahaneys ziwroy iszanut sann ew amenayn aszarhia Hayoc".

\(^3\) SO p. 158.

\(^4\) KG p. 363: "This [emir] Arghun designated what was proper [for tax collection] in all four Khanates, for he was a just man. But as for monks, friars, and Church foundations, he did not place them under taxation, nor the ēalan [tax] either. The same went for sheikhs and dervishes. He freed [from taxation] all those Believers called the Servants of God" (KG p. 235; Mur. p. 108).

\(^5\) KG p. 359: "...[Hasan] also received a document guaranteeing freedom for lord Nereēs, kat'olikos of Albania, for all his properties and goods, that he be free and untaxed and allowed to travel freely everywhere in the dioceses under his authority, and that no one disobey what he said".
The fact that Hasan, subsequently "being harassed by tax-collectors and by [emir] Arghun"—was obliged to visit the Far East to complain, demonstrates the crucial point, and is equally valid for the secular Hasan and the clerical Nerses. It was not enough simply to have written patents of authority or protection. The local Mongol novins did not always implement them.

In the late 1270's according to the History of K'art'li, the twelve retreats of Garesja, Georgia were taxed by the Mongols—even though under the administration of so loyal a Mongol supporter as Sadun Arcruni/Mahkanaberdeli. In the early 1280's (and presumably before), more than 150 Armenian monasteries within the Georgian state were being taxed. Consequently we must conclude that even before the Islamization of the Mongols, many Armenian churches were taxed.

1 KG p. 359: "Nekeal i harkapahanjac'nt ew yArkunen".
2 KG p. 272; Mur. p. 142.
3 SO p. 173: "Thereafter Tarsayiç [Orbëlean] held the atabekate of the land of Armenia, and did many things to lighten[the lot of] the harassed Armenian people. Going to Tiflis he had brought forth the royal diwan and read all the names of the Armenian monasteries, and such remained in the diwan as taxable (i nek'oy harki). So he had fetched the senior siknawpar of the archives and changed the dawt'ar. He removed the names of more than 150 monasteries, [from the tax-register] and burned the old [register] in the fire. Thus did he free all the churches".
2. Armenian Clerical Presence at the Courts of the Khâns

William of Rubruck and Het'um the Historian provide valuable information regarding Armenian clerics in Asia and about Armenian Christian influence on the Khâns. Rubruck who travelled to the Far East during 1253-55 found Armenian priests at virtually all the major stopping places. At the very start of his trip, in Constantinople he met and conversed with Armenian merchants and resident clerics. At Sarai on the Volga river, the capital of the Northern Tatars, he encountered at the court of Sartakh-Khân (Batu's son) "Armenian priests who knew Turkish and Arabic" and were employed as translators in addition to performing religious duties. Armenian priests were serving as translators in Qara Qorum, Mongolia also as William subsequently discovered.

In Qara Qorum, Rubruck came upon a small Armenian chapel. Its colorful attendant was the "monk" Sargis. This

1 WR p. xxxvii.
2 WR p. 105.
3 WR pp. 166, 205.
impostor claimed that:

...he had been a hermit in the country of Jerusalem, and that God had appeared to him three times, enjoining on him to go to the Prince of the Tartars. But as he neglected going, God threatened him the third time, striking him down to the ground, and saying that he should die if he did not go; and that he should say to Möngke--Khan that if he would become a Christian, all the world would come under his rule, and that the great Pope would obey him... 1.

Sargis indeed was an Armenian, "swarthy and lank"\(^2\), but not a priest; and, if a Christian, of a rather shamanistic sort\(^3\):

...but he lied, for he had taken no [religious] orders, and did not know a single letter, but was a cloth weaver, as I found out in his own country, which I went through on my way back. 4.

Although William does not mention other Armenian clerics by names, he does alude to their presence. Thus, worried

---

1 WR p. 169.
2 WR p. 168.
4 WR p. 193.
that the Pope's letters he was carrying may have been tampered with, he wrote:

...I feared that as those who had interpreted your letters were Armenians from Greater Armenia—great haters of the Saracens—they had perhaps through hatred and for the discomfiture of the Saracens, gratuitously translated as had suited their fancy. 1.

Furthermore, Rubruck's comment that Armenian Easter was celebrated in Qara Qorum with a large clerical procession to the Khan's residence, only makes sense if there were a sizeable number of Armenian clerics present 2.

While in Qara Qorum, William encountered an unnamed Armenian lordly petitioner to Möngke-Khan:

A certain Armenian who had come with the monk had brought this said cross from Jerusalem, as he said, and it was of silver, weighing perhaps four marks, and had four gems in the angles and one in the center; and it did not have the image of the Savior, for the Armenians and Nestorians are ashamed to show the Christ fixed to the Cross. And they had presented it to Möngke-Khan, and Möngke asked him what he wanted. Then he said he was the son of an Armenian priest, whose church had been destroyed by the Saracens, and he asked his help to restore this church. Then Möngke asked him with how much it could be rebuilt, and he said two hundred iascot—that is two thousand marks. And he ordered that he should be given letters to him who receives the tribute in Persia and Greater Armenia, to pay him this sum of silver. 3.

1 WR p. 166.
2 WR p. 187.
3 WR p. 191.
In my opinion, the lord mentioned above probably was Smbat Orbelean, whose first trip to the Far East took place while William was in Qara Qorum.

Het‘um the Historian’s History provides an account of Armenian Christian influence in the courts of various Mongol Khāns. Evidently, some of his information is fanciful or perhaps even wishful thinking. However, the unmistakable import of his narration is that Armenian Christians enjoyed considerable influence with different Khāns. Supposedly, when king Het‘um of Cilicia visited Möngke-Khān in the early 1250’s:

...First he urged the Khān to convert to Christianity and to accept Baptism together with his people; second, that eternal peace and friendship be established between Christians and Tatars; third, that it be possible to construct Christian churches in all of the Tatar countries and that the Armenians be freed from taxes and other burdens; fourth, that the Holy Land and the Holy Sepulcher be wrested from the Turks and given to the Christians; fifth, that the caliph in Baghdad, the head of the [Muslim] religion, be done away with...When the Tatar Khan had consulted with his princes and grandees, he replied to the king of Armenia: 'I accept your requests. I shall accept baptism and adopt the Christian religion and show concern that all my subjects do likewise... 1.

1 Het‘um p. 45.
Chapter 24 of the History is entitled "Regarding the Baptism of Môngke-Khān":

Now after Môngke had accepted the requests of the Armenian king with charitable munificence, he had himself baptised by the chancellor of the Armenian kingdom, who was a bishop. With him [were baptised] his house and numerous other esteemed and grand men and women. 1.

The Cilician king Kewon (like all the Cilician kings) is elevated in Het'um's account to the position of defender of the Christians. When visiting Abaqa-Khān in Iran:

...the king of Armenia beseeched him regarding freeing the Holy Land from the infidels. And Abaqa so promised, simultaneously advising the Armenian king to send emissaries to the Pope and to the orthodox kings [regarding this matter]. 2.

Thus we may conclude that an Armenian clerical presence existed at the courts of the Khāns already by the early 1250's, and probably earlier. It may have developed into a sizeable presence before the Islamization of the Mongols in the late 13-early 14th centuries, involving clerics both from Greater Armenia and Cilicia. The influence of Christian Cilician kings with the Khāns ended with Mongol Islamization.

1 Het'um p. 46.

2 Het'um p. 57.
Bibliography

I. Sources

AL

Aristakes Lastivertc'i, Patmut'iywn Aristakii Lastivertc'woy [History of Aristakes Lastivertc'i], K. N. Yuzbasyan, ed. (Erevan, 1963).

BH, Chronicon Syriacum

CIA

Corpus Inscriptionum Armenicarum [Divan Hay Vimagrut yan]

Clav.

Dawit' of Ganjak

Ouvrage de Malakia-Abégha, ou Malakia-le-Moine, in Additions et éclaircissements à l'Histoire de la Georgie, M. Brosset, trans. (St. Petersburg, 1851).

Hayoc' nor vkanera, 1155-1843 [Armenian Neo-martyrs, ANM], Y. Manandean, Hr. Acarean, ed. (Vaiarşapat, 1903).

Het'um Het'um the Historian, Het'um patmič T'at'arac' [Het'um, Historian of the Tatars], M. Awgerean, trans. (Venice, 1842).

 Ibn Bibi

Ibn Bibi, Die Seltschukengeschichte des Ibn Bibi Munkszaard (Kopenhagen, 1959).

Trans. of passages relevant to Armenia: Hayastan Ibn Bibi Hamemat [Armenia According to Ibn Bibi]
P. Ter-Polosean, trans., HA (1960):

 Juanšer

 Juvaini

 KC

 KG

Trans.: "Histoire d’Arménie par le vartabied Kirakos de Gantzac", Deux historiens arméniens, M.F. Brosset trans. (St. Petersburg, 1870).

MC
Manzamanakagrut‘yunner XIII-XVIII
dd. [Minor Chronicles of the XIII-XVIII Centuries], V.A. Hakobyan, ed.
vol. 1 (Erevan, 1951);
vol. 2 (Erevan, 1956).

MED
Matthew of Edessa; Patmut‘iwn Matt‘esai Uthavec woy [History of Matthew of Edessa], (Jerusalem, 1869).
Trans.: Bibliothèque historique arménienne, I, E. Dulaurier, trans.
(Paris, 1858).

Mxit‘ar Ayrivanec‘i Mxit‘ar Ayrivanec‘i, Histoire chronologique Mkhitar d’Arivank
M. Brosset, trans. (St. Petersburg, 1869).

Mxit‘ar Goš
Mxit‘ar Goš, "The Albanian Chronicle of Mxit‘ar Goš", C.J.F. Dowsett, trans. BSOAS #21 (1958).

Afakk‘ [Fables], (Venice, 1854).

Girk‘ datastani [Law Book],
X. T’orosyan, ed. (Erevan, 1975).

Qazvini, The Geographical Part of the Nuzhat-al-Qulub of Hamd-Allah Muṣṭawfi of Qazvin, G. Le Strange,

Rashid al-Dīn
Rashid al-Dīn, The Successors of Genghis Khan, J.A. Boyle, trans.
(New York, 1971).

Sbornik letopisei [Collection of Chronicles], A.K. Arends, trans.
(Moscow-Leningrad, 1946).

Samuel of Ani, Samuel k‘ahanavi
Anec woy hawak munk‘i kroc ‘patmagrac’ [Samuel the Priest of Ani’s Collection of Historians’ Writings], A. Ter-Mik‘elean, ed. (Vaiarsapat, 1893).
Trans. : Collection d'historiens arméniens, M. Brosset, trans. vol. II (St. Petersburg, 1876).

Schiltberger

Smbat Sparapet

Smbat Sparapet, Smbatay Sparapeti taregirk' [Chronicle of Smbat Sparapet], S. Agelean, ed. (Venice, 1956).

SO

Spuler, Bertold

History of the Mongols Based on Eastern and Western Accounts of the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Centuries, translated from the German by H. and S. Drummond (Berkeley, 1972).

TA

T'Ovma Arcruni, T'Ovmayi vardapeti Arcrunwoc Patmut'iwn tann Arcruneac' [Vardapet T'Ovma Arcruni's History of the Arcrunid House], (St. Petersburg, 1887).

T:M

T'Ovma Mecop'ec'i, Patmut'iwn Tank-T'amuray ew vajordac' iwroc', arareal T'Ovma vardapeti Mecop ec woy [The History of Tamerlane and His Successors by Vardapet T'Ovma Mecop ec'i], K. Sahnazarean, ed. (Paris, 1860).

TM, col. T'ovma Mecop'ec'u višatkarane [T'ovma Mecop'ec'i's Colophon], K. Kostaneanc, ed. (Tiflis, 1892).

VA, Hist. Vardan Arewelc'i, Hawak'umna patmut'ean Vardanay vardapeti lusabaneal [Compilation of History by Vardapet Vardan Arewelc'i] (Venice, 1862).

VT Vimakan taregir [Annal of Inscriptions], K. Kostaneanc, ed. (St. Petersburg, 1913).

Yağut Yaqut al-Hamavi. Passages relevant to Armenia and neighboring areas have been drawn from the Armenian translation in Arabakan, pp. 5-121.

II. Literature

Abrahamyan, "Ruk'n-ed-Dini partut'yune [The Defeat of Rukn al-Din]", Te`ekagir #5-6 (1941).

Akinean, N., "Akanc ' kam Akneri vank'a [Akanc' or Akner Monastery]", HA (1948).

"Ašt'amaray kat'okosac', gawenganag'ka [The Succession of the Kat'okol of Ašt'amari]" HA (1915).

"Grigor k'ahanay Aknero'i patmagir T'at'arac' Patmut'-ywn 1250-1335 [Grigor the Priest of Akner, Historian of the History of the T'at'ars]", HA (1948).

Review of Kirakos Ganjakeci'i (Tiflis, 1909), HA (1910).

Alişan, L., Hayapstum [Antiquities], (Venice, 1901).

Sirak (Venice, 1890).

Sisakan (Venice, 1893).

"Hayastani mijndarvan k'at'akan evn rahqer'yan soc'ial-

"Mecatunneri k'at'akan evn vernaxaxi jevavorume [Formation of the Mecatun Urban Upper Stratum]", HAP ch. 34.

Avagyany, S.A., "Tanutar 'iwn" termine Ani XI dari arjanagrut'yan mej [The Term "Tanutar 'iwn" in an 18th Century Inscription from Ani]", PBH #2 (1971).

Avdalbegyan, T'., "Haykakan arjanagrut'yunneri mej mi ga'nik'- ev nra n'egagrut'yu Hayastani 13-14rd darerum tntes-akan patmut yan hamar [A Secret in the Armenian Inscriptions and Its Significance for the Economic History of Armenia in the 13-14th Centuries]", Teiekagir #2 (1927).

"Hayastane Hulavyan i'shanut'yan tirapetut'yan nerk'o [Armenia under Huleguid Domination]", HAP ch. 37.

"Hayastane monkolakan tirapetut'yan a'alin arjanum [Armenia in the First Period of the Mongol Domination]", HAP ch. 36.

"Monkolakan ar'savank'nere ev Hayastani nva'cume [The Mongol Invasions and the Conquest of Armenia]", HAP ch.35.
Sotsial’no-ekonomicheskaia i politicheskaia istoriia Armenii v XIII-XIV vekakh [The Socio-Economic and Political History of Armenia in the XIII-XIVth Centuries], (Moscow, 1969).

"Zakaryan erak' isxanut‘yunneri kazmavorume [The Formation of the Three Zak‘ard Principalities]", HAP ch. 32.

Barxutareanc‘, M., Arc‘ax (Baku, 1895).

Bausani, A., "Religion under the Mongols", SMP ch. 7.

"Salduxyannera Karinum [The Saltukids in Karin]", HAP ch. 28.

Boyle, J. A., ed., The Cambridge History of Iran, vol. 5, the Saljuq and Mongol Periods (Cambridge, 1968)[SMP].

Çamjian, M., Patmut'awn Hayoc' skzbané ašxarhi minqew zam testn 1784 est awandelov avlayl matenagac ' [History of the Armenians from the Creation of the World to A.D. 1784According to the Accounts of Diverse Sources] 3 vol. (Venice, 1784-86).

Cahen, Cl., Pre-Ottoman Turkey (London, 1968).

Der Nersessian, S., Armenia and the Byzantine Empire (Cambridge, Mass., 1945).

Eremyan, S., Amirspasalar Zak'aria Erkaynabazuk [Amirspasalar Zak'aria Mtargreel], (Erevan, 1944).

Hakobyan, T.'X., Hayastani patmakan așxarhagru't'yun [Armenia's Historical Geography], (Erevan, 1968).

Step’anos Orbelyan (Erevan, 1960).

Syunik'i t'agavorut'yun [The Kingdom of Siunik'] (Erevan, 1966).

Harut'yunyan, B., "Feod-in ev beneficium-in hamaspatasxaroi terminnera hay miñadaryan grakanut'yun mej [Terms Corresponding to Feod and Beneficium in Medieval Armenian Literature]", Lraber #12 (1958).

Hovhannisyan, A., Drvagner hay azatagrakan mtk'i patmut'yan vol. 1 [Episodes from the History of Armenian Liberal-ational Thought], (Erevan, 1957).

Jalalean, S., Canaparhordut’iwm i mecn Hayastan [Journey to Greater Armenia] I(Tiflis, 1842), II(Tiflis, 1858).

Kazhdan, A.P., Armiane v sostave gospodstvuiushchego klassa Vizantii v XI-XII vv. [Armenians in the Composition of the Ruling Class of Byzantium in the XI-XII Centuries], (Moscow, 1975).

Kurdian, H., "Yamikoneanneri Deel Cule [The Deel Branch of the Yamikoneans]", Bazmavep (1956).

Lafadaryan, K., "Patmahagitakan ditolut’yunner nor Berdi Kyurikyanneri isxanut yan masin [Historiographical Observations on the Kiwrikean Principality of Nor Berd]", Telekasir #4-5 (1949).

"Ganjaki gawat [The District of Ganjak]", Azgagrakan Handes (1899).

Laurent, M.J., "Byzance et Antioche sous le curopalate Philarète", REA IX (1929).

Lordkipanidze, D., Istoriia gruzii Xi-nachala XIII beka [The History of Georgia from the XII to the Beginning of the XIII Century], (Tbilisi, 1974).
Manandyan, H.A., Feodalizme hin Hayastanum [Feudalism in Ancient Armenia], (Erevan, 1934).

-- K'nankan tesut'yun Hay žolovrdi patmut'yan [Critical Survey of the History of the Armenian People], vol. 3 (Erevan, 1952).

Marr, N. Ia., "Arkaun, mongol'skoe nazvanie khristian[Arkaun, the Mongolian Designation for Christians]", Vizantiiski Vremenik XII (1905).

Massé, H., "Le sultan seldjoukide Keykobad Ier et l'Arménie", REA IX (1929).

Mikaelian, G.G., Istoriiia Kilikiiskogo Armianskogo gosudarstva [History of the Cilician Armenian State], (Erevan, 1952).

Moule, A.C., Christians in China before 1550 (New York, 1930).

Perikhanyan, A., "Drevnearnianskie vostanki [The ostanik`s in Ancient Armenia]", VDI #2 (1956).

P`ir kale`mean, L., "Notark` hayoc` [Constantinople, 1888].

Sahnazarean, A., "Zak'arean tohmi caguma [Origin of the Zak'arid Clan]", Sołakat (Važarsapat, 1913).

Taşean, Y., C'uc'ak hayeren jeqragac' Kayserakan matenadar-anin I Vienna [Catalogue of Armenian Manuscripts at the Imperial Library of Vienna], (Vienna, 1891).

-- C'uc'ak hayeren jeqragac' matenadar-anin Mxit'areanc' I Vienna [Catalogue of the Armenian Manuscripts at the Mxit'arić Library in Vienna], (Vienna, 1895).

T'emuryan, V., "Hayeni artagai'te depi Gamirk' llrd darum [The Emigration of Armenians to Cappadocia in the 11th Century]", Tešekagir #2 (1955).

-- "Hayena Egiptosum [The Armenians in Egypt]", HAP ch.30.

"Sah Armänneri amirayut 'yune Xlat'um [The Emirate of the Shah Armens at Xlat']", HAP ch. 28.

"Xedenekyan Arccruninere Vaspurakanum [The Xedenekean Arcrunids in Vaspurakan]", HAP ch. 28.

"Zak'aria ev Ivanei arabataf arijanagrut 'yune anberdum [Zak'aria's and Ivane's Inscription in Arabic from Anberd]", PBH #1 (1971).

T'op'uzyan, Ō. X., "Mijagetk'i ev Asorik'ı haykakan galt'-avayyere [Armenian Settlements in Mesopotamia and Syria]", HAP ch. 30.

"Caucasia and Byzantium", Traditio 27 (1971).

"The Fifteenth-Century Bagratids and the Institution of Collegial Sovereignty in Georgia", Traditio 7 (1949-51).

"Medieval Georgian Historical Literature (VII-XVth Centuries)", Traditio 1 (1943).

Vryonis, S., The Decline of Medieval Hellenism in Asia Minor and the Process of Islamization from the Eleventh through the Fifteenth Century (Los Angeles, 1971). [DMM]

---

Seljuk Gulyani and Ottoman Devshirmes*, Der Islam XLI (1965).

Xačikyan, L.S., "Syunyac' Òrbelyanneri Burt'elyan čvula [The Biwrt'el'ean Branch of the Siwnid Orbeleans], BM #9 (1969).

---

Hayastane Čobanyanneri ev Jelairyanneri tirapetut'yan žamanakaşrianum [Armenia in the Period of the Domination of the Chobanids and Jalayirids]*, HAP IV ch. 1.

---

Hayastani k'âlak'akan vičaka ev soc'ial-tntesakan haraberut yunnera XIV-XV.darerum [Armenia's Political Situation and Socio-Economic Relations in the XIV-XVth Centuries]*, HAP IV ch. 1.

Yovsep'ean, G., Nor niwt'er T'ovma Mecop'ec'u kensagret'te ym hamar [New Materials for the Biography of T'ovma Mecop'ec'i], Ararat (1913).

---

Potomstvo Tarsayicha Orbeliana i Mina-Khatuny [The Posterity of Tarsayi Orbelean and Mina-Khatun], Khristianskii Vostok, II (1913).

---

with Agadzanov, S.G., "K istorii tiurskich nabegov na Armeniyyu v XII [Toward the History of the Turkish Raids on Armenia in the 11th Century]", Palestinskii Sbornik #12 (1965).

Zamkocyan, H., "Ani k'ala'k'um erku XIIInd arjanagrut'yunneri maein [On Two 13th Century Inscriptions from the City of Ani]", GAEPH #47 (1956).

"Patmut'iwn vaen azgin netolac' erki helinaka [The Author of the Work History of the Nation of the Archers]" GAEPH #23 (1946).
amir-hejub
Grand Chamberlain.

amir-spasalar Commander-in-Chief of the Army.

atabek
"father-guardian".

azat
Arm./Iran. literally "free", designation for lesser gentry.

"hero".

bahatur
"tax collector".

basqaq
Georg. "great one", high noble.

elchi
envoy, ambassador.

eristav

hayrenik'
Arm. "patrimony", a form of landhold.

Tl-Khan
Mong. subordinate Khan, title of the Khan of Iraq (i.e., subordinate to the Great Khan).

inju
Mong. "demesne", a landhold directly tributary to the Khan or members of the Khan's family.

jizya poll-tax, originally on non-Muslims.

kat'otikoa
head of the Armenian Church.

kesik(toyk)
"imperial guard".

kharaj
land tax.

khatun
"queen, princess, lady".

mal
"property, cattle tax".

mandat'urt'uxuc'es
Georg. "High Marshall" of the Georgian Court.

mecatun
Arm. literally "of a great House", wealthy merchant.
Georg. Treasurer of the Georgian Court.

Arm. "noble".

"general, commander, official".

tablet of authority.

national assembly.

Minister of Finance.

"guards".

tax in kind.

Arm. "lord of the House".

Arm. "lord", secular and clerical.

10,000 troops.

Arm. "House, clan, family".

Arm. doctor of the Armenian Church.

"decree, order, law".

code of law.

"pasturing grounds".
Карта "Размещение на Украине русских войск в 1123 году Абу-Эйнана."

Текст на русском языке:
"Карта показывает размещение на Украине русских войск в 1123 году Абу-Эйнана."

Подробности карты:
- Показаны территории восточной и южной частей Украины.
- Основные города и области отмечены значками.
- Картографическая информация о местоположении войск.

Дополнительная информация:
- Карта предоставлена в интересах изучения исторического размещения войск.
- Визуализация помощи в военных действиях армии Абу-Эйнана в 1123 году.

Важно отметить, что данная карта требует внимательного чтения и анализа для полного понимания ее содержания.